DigitalCommons@Wayne has been around for a handful of years. With increased interest here at Wayne and in the greater scholarly community in making research more discoverable and open, the libraries have increased efforts to promote and grow DC@Wayne. The email I sent yesterday is simply one example of how we are reaching out to faculty.

Submitting your post print to DC@Wayne will in no way conflict with your requirement to also submit to PubMed Central. By submitting your post print to us, we’ll be able to provide an additional stable and perpetual access point to your research hosted here at Wayne. The content of DC@Wayne is indexed by Google and Google Scholar and you will be provided with monthly readership reports that include statistics on full-text downloads of your submitted work.
If you have further questions, let me know and I may be able to provide some links or documents that will provide more details.

Katrina:

Thanks for your request for our recently published manuscript. This is the first time that I have heard of Wayne doing this. is it new?

I will definitely be submitting the manuscript to Pub Med Central (because it was supported with federal funding). Does posting it in a Wayne State repository in any way preclude or conflict with putting it in Pub Med Central?

Mark

Dear Professor Lumley,

Your journal article:

is published in a journal (Annals of Behavioral Medicine) that allows for deposit of the final accepted manuscript copy (or "post print") of articles into an Institutional Repository, like DigitalCommons@WayneState (DC@WSU, http://digitalcommons.wayne.edu/).

Do you have the final accepted manuscript copy of this article?

If you do, would you send us a copy? We would then be happy to take care of formatting and depositing it for you. You and your co-authors retain all copyrights; you simply grant us a non-exclusive, one-time license to archive and distribute the article through Wayne State's open access repository.

Your post print is substantially no different than the published version of your article -- the content is the same, and we make sure that the post print is edited and typeset to approximate the quality of the final published version. Depositing your article in DC@WSU increases the visibility and accessibility of the article, which in turn increases its potential impact/citability. We include the citation to the version of record.

If you are interested in contributing your work to the Institutional Repository, please just respond with a quick "yes" to this email, and attach a copy of your post print.

Please let me know if you have any questions.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Katrina
