January 1990

About The Authors

Sociological Practice Editors

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.wayne.edu/socprac

Recommended Citation
Editors, Sociological Practice (1990) "About The Authors," Sociological Practice: Vol. 8: Iss. 1, Article 1.
Available at: http://digitalcommons.wayne.edu/socprac/vol8/iss1/1

This Contributors is brought to you for free and open access by the Open Access Journals at DigitalCommons@WayneState. It has been accepted for inclusion in Sociological Practice by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@WayneState.
About The Authors

Robert C. Anderson is a professor in community development programs at Michigan State University. He earned his B.S. and M.S. degrees at the University of Minnesota and his Ph.D. at Michigan State University. His works are widely published in books, journals, and newspapers in fields such as soil chemistry, career development, organizational theory, inter-organizational relations, community development, public policies, and university outreach. He is the author of Approaches to Community Development.

Harold R. Baker is professor of extension at the University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Canada. He has written some seventy-five chapters, papers and articles on agricultural and rural extension, community development and rural change. He is a member of the Canadian Agriculture and Rural Restructuring Group, a research and policy analysis team of researchers, civil servants, and rural policy makers which is linked with a network in Western Europe and the United States. He is a past president of the Community Development Society.

Michael Bamberger is a senior sociologist and coordinator for Asia with the Economic Development Institute of the World Bank. Over the past five years he has been responsible for organizing seminars for senior officials, trainers and researchers from Asia and parts of Africa and the Middle East. Training topics have covered a wide range of issues including community participation, monitoring and evaluation of development projects, project sustainability, investment planning and management. He worked for ten years in community participation projects and program evaluation in Latin America before joining the World Bank.

Ted K. Bradshaw is a research sociologist in the Institute of Governmental Studies and teaches in the department of city and regional planning at the University of California at Berkeley. He is a co-author of Rural Communities in Advanced Industrial Society: Development and Developers, and he currently is working on a series of studies of rural development policy in the United States.

Elaine Cumming was trained as a sociologist at Harvard University. She has served as a research worker with the Psychiatric Services Branch of Saskatchewan Province, Canada. At the time of publishing her 1955 article with John Cumming, she was doing research in Nova Scotia. She also was affiliated with Cornell University.

John Cumming was senior psychiatrist at Saskatchewan Hospital in Weyburn in the early 1950s. He also held an appointment at Cornell University. He received special training in social science at Harvard University and graduated from Toronto University’s medical school.

Kurt Finsterbusch is an associate professor of sociology at the University of Maryland. His current work is on economic development in rural counties in the United States and the Third World. His publications include: Understanding Social Impacts (1980), Organizational Changes as a Development Strategy (1987) with Jerald Hage, and Fitting Projects: Methods of Social Analysis for Projects in Developing Countries (1980) edited with Jay Ingersoll and Lynn Llewellyn.

Cornelia Butler Flora is head of the sociology department at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University. Just before taking this position, she was a university distinguished professor at Kansas State University. She is a former president of the Rural Sociological Society and the first recipient of that society’s award for excellence in research. She writes and consults on rural development, sustainable agriculture, and women in development.

Jan L. Flora is a rural sociologist. He is currently a professor in the agricultural economics department at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University. From 1987 to 1989, he was acting director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives at Kansas State University. He has written on rural development in the United States and Latin America. He is collaborating with Cornelia Flora in a research project on rural self-development projects in the United States.

Cecelia Formichella is a doctoral student in sociology at the University of Maryland. She has recently published, with J. Steven Thomas, an article entitled “Rational Exchange and Trust: Business Relationships in a Fishing Community” in Sociological Spectrum (1989).

Peggy Hickman is an associate professor in the Decker School of Nursing at the State University of New York (SUNY) at Binghamton. She is also a research associate in the SUNY center for educational and social research and the center for nursing research. She is a past board member of the Community Development Society and also is active in the American Public Health Association.

Drew Hyman is professor of public policy and community systems in the department of agricultural economics and rural sociology at The Pennsylvania State University. His work focuses on models of community development and Daniel Kuennen has been, for seventeen years, a community resource development extension specialist with the cooperative extension service, University of Delaware. He has contributed to over two hundred community development projects and has published extensively in the Delaware extension publication series.

Alvin S. Lackey is a professor of community development in the University of Missouri's department of community development. He also directs the graduate school's interdisciplinary minor in international development. In addition to his domestic teaching, research and extension work in community development, he has over eighteen years of Third World experience in community development and related fields. He has published several journal articles as well as two volumes of Community Development Abstracts.

Raymond C. Lenzi is an assistant professor of community development at the University of Missouri-Columbia. In addition, he is a certified industrial developer. He was employed previously for five years with the University of Wisconsin extension service where he coordinated county level economic development efforts and worked on coal related issues. He has a number of publications in community economic development planning, development finance, downtown revitalization and business retention and expansion.

Dorothea Leighton (1908-1989) was a psychiatrist and pioneer medical anthropologist. Among her major works were: The Navaho Door with Alexander Leighton, The Navaho and Children of the People with Clyde Kluckhohn, and People of the Middle Place with John Adair. She was principle author of The Character of Danger, the report of the Sterling County, Nova Scotia study. After helping to found the Society for Medical Anthropology, she became its first president.

A. E. Luloff is an associate professor of rural sociology at the University of New Hampshire. He is engaged in teaching, research, and writing on the role and place of community development and planning in rural and small towns. His work elaborates on the impacts of rapid social and land use change as a result of in-migration. He recently has helped to organize and develop state centers which focus on local rural development activities.

Jack McCall serves nine counties as an area community development specialist with the University of Missouri's extension system. Jack has fifteen years of experience in community development and has served as a consultant on numerous projects throughout the country. He also has been a youth specialist and a specialist on environmental issues.

G. David Miller has worked in community development in Israel, Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia and Afghanistan. In addition to his service as a Peace Corps volunteer, he has held administrative positions in the Agency for International Development, Save the Children, and the Peace Corps. He is now coordinator and associate professor of the international community economic development program at New Hampshire College.

Bryan M. Phifer is a professor emeritus of community development at the University of Missouri, Columbia. He has been deputy director of community resource development, with the USDA extension service, director of community and public sector extension programs, University of Missouri, and professor and extension program leader in the University of Missouri’s department of community development. He served as the first editor of the Journal of the Community Development Society and has authored numerous publications.

Meredith S. Ramsay is with the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland. For her doctoral dissertation, she is researching the political economy of a county on the Delmarva Peninsula.

Irving Thomas Stone is a professor of anthropology at Potsdam College, State University of New York. His current research specializations include the ethnohistory of arctic and subarctic North America and microsocial studies of distributive justice and inequality.

Jack Timmons is an associate professor and chair of the community development department at the University of Missouri-Columbia. He has twenty-five years experience practicing and teaching community development. He currently teaches a graduate course on community development practice and is a state specialist in university extension.

Betty Wells is an associate professor of sociology, and extension sociologist, in the sociology and anthropology department at Iowa State University. Her major extension roles are leadership, organization, and rural community development. In addition to her work on programming and applied research on voluntary intercommunity initiatives, she also develops educational materials for use by community leaders and extension staff. Recent presentations to citizen and professional audiences have included materials on working with groups and organizations, developing interpersonal and intercultural relations, and building rural coalitions and alliances.

Kenneth P. Wilkinson is a professor of rural sociology at the Pennsylvania State University. He is engaged in teaching, research, and writing on collective action and social change in small towns and rural areas. The community as a social field is a major area of interest. In recent years, he has concentrated on the implications of rural policy for community development and social well-being. He is a former president of the Rural Sociological Society.