ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I want to thank my committee chair Professor Ewa Golebiowska for the encouragement and persistence on only accepting the best from me in this process. I also owe my committee of Professor Ronald Brown, Professor Jodi Nachtwey, and Professor David Martin a debt of gratitude for their help and advisement in this endeavor. All of them were instrumental in keeping my focus narrowed to produce the best research possible.

I also owe appreciation to the commentary, suggestions, and research help from my wonderful wife Courtney Tozzi. This project was definitely more enjoyable with her encouragement and help. Mr. Michael Kleingartner from Oakland University proved invaluable with his help in auditing my content analysis of media coverage and assisting me in my first venture into the R Statistical Computing Environment. His crosschecking of my coding scheme and advisement on how to improve it significantly improved that portion of my study.

I want to thank the Political Science Department and the Wayne State University Graduate School for the financial and research support they provided along the way which made this scholarly work far easier to achieve. I also appreciate the efforts that Ms. Cindy Krolikowski, our Political Science Department Librarian, made to help me with the campus databases to find my media transcripts. I thank the Administrative staff within the Department of Political Science, Ms. Patricia Robinson, Ms. Delinda Neal, and Ms. She’re Davis, who expedited this process saving me time and worry. I also owe my appreciation to my family for their support, encouragement, and assistance.

INTRODUCTION

The use of polls and the study of public opinion are relatively new to political science. In the American political system, most Americans have an opinion of the president who is the most powerful figure. The most significant measure of public opinion that determines the president's popularity is the president's approval rate. Research began forty years ago to find what determines presidential approval. There is still plenty to understand about the approval rate and the variables that change it, but there are also known variables that have predictable influences on presidential approval. My study's goal is to better understand the approval rate for President George W. Bush, to see what has changed from previous approval research, and to find what is unique to Bush’s approval rate.

The advent of popular sovereignty in America and Western Europe was the impetus for the serious study of public opinion. Initially, electoral returns were the only way to measure public opinion (Erikson et. al. 3). In the 1930s, the Gallup Organization was the first to conduct a survey measuring presidential approval. Today, opinion polls are expected to be accurate, whereas sixty to one hundred years ago they were not accurate. Presidents, since Franklin Roosevelt, have used pollsters and monitored polls.

The president's approval rate is the most commonly used indicator of public opinion of the president. It is also the most mentioned poll in the media and probably the most well-known poll among the American public. The approval rate indicates

1 I use the male pronoun for the U.S. president because there has not yet been a female U.S. president and also because this study is concerned with the George W. Bush Administration.
whether people approve or disapprove of the job the president is doing. A high approval rate can help the president's legislative agenda, if the legislation concerns salient and complex issues (Canes-Wrone and de Marchi 2002). On the other hand, presidents with low approval rates tend to increase expenditures and deficit spending around an election year (Burstein 1998). Usually greater public support for a president and his goals increases the likelihood that his policies are enacted. In short, public opinion can affect the president's actions.

Presidents care about their approval rates for a couple of reasons. First, presidents monitor their approval rates to help them get reelected. Presidents are elected to four year terms (U.S. Const. art. II, sect. 1, cl. 2) and can only serve two full terms as president (U.S. Const. am. XXII, sect. 1, cl. 1). The approval rate is a strong indicator of a sitting president's reelection prospects. The president always gets reelected when he has an approval rate of 50 percent or higher in June of the election year (Lewis-Beck and Rice 1992). Second, presidents want to implement their agendas, and high public support for their agendas makes their implementation more likely (Canes-Wrone and de Marchi 2002). American politicians have known for awhile that having public support for their agenda is crucial. As President Abraham Lincoln once said, “With public sentiment, nothing can fail; without it nothing can succeed. Consequently, he who moulds (sic) public sentiment goes deeper than he who enacts statutes or pronounces decisions. He makes statutes and decisions possible or impossible to be executed. (Johannsen 65)” Presidential approval, though relatively new, helps gauge public opinion of the president and his agenda.

Over the past 40 years, presidential approval elicited much interest from political scientists. Researchers of the presidency flocked to this topic because of its prominence among the general public and political system. This prominence is a direct result of the growth and modernization of polling, the growth in news coverage on it, and the growth in presidential power. The first political scientist to study presidential approval in depth was John E. Mueller in his 1973 classic, War, Presidents and Public Opinion. He discovered patterns in the movement of presidential approval from his analysis of U.S. foreign conflicts, economic performance, and public opinion of the presidency. Another influential study is Brody's 1991 book, Assessing the President, where he linked the change in media coverage of the president to the change in presidential approval.

My study is concerned with how George W. Bush's approval rate is affected by the news media and the economy. I also control for the effects of honeymoon periods, rally effect periods, the second term period, and the divided government period. These variables have a strong influence on the approval rate for most presidencies (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002).

Variables Influencing Presidential Approval

My research shows the relationship between Bush’s approval rate, the economy, the media, rally effect period, honeymoon period, divided government period, second term period, and lagged approval. President Bush’s approval rate is the dependent variable in this study. My aim is to combine the independent variables to predict presidential approval. Several other studies analyze approval as a dependent variable, and my study is no different in this respect.

The state of the U.S. economy affects how people view the president. People criticize and praise the president for the condition of the country’s economy because the president is the leader of the executive branch for U.S. government. As a result he has an enormous amount of power and responsibility for the prosperity of the country. The president, with the help of Congress, has tools at his disposal to affect the economy of the United States. People know about the condition of the U.S. economy from the media and usually lay responsibility for the condition of the economy on the U.S. Government. However, people do not hold the government responsible for their own personal economic situation (Brody 1991).

It is a common assumption that economic prosperity leads to an increasing approval rate and an economic recession leads to a decreasing approval rate (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 42). Mueller (1973:240) found that as unemployment increases the approval rate decreases, and Kramer (1971) found a relationship between the change in real disposable income and the chances for the president’s party winning Congress. These studies, among others, provide a clear link between the national economy and presidential popularity. Some research does not find a significant relationship between presidential approval and the state of the U.S. economy (Norpoth and Yantek 1983; Yantek 1982; Kenski 1977). However, studies not showing a relationship are fewer than the studies that do. When controlling for different presidencies, the relationship between the economy and approval rate grows and becomes more significant (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 43-48).

Another important variable that affects presidential approval is the media (Brody 1991). The modern news media’s pervasive presence in our lives has a major impact on 2 When people do this they are making sociotropic evaluations of the president. I further explain this concept in the next chapter.

how we think and act, which is no less true for its effect on our orientation to politics. In the last forty years, the relationship between presidential candidates, the political system, and the news media has strengthened as the media report incessantly about the presidency. News is now instant and easily accessible, especially through the internet, and can be very influential on our thoughts and opinions (West 2001). These are some reasons why the news media make us believe what is the most important news event.

The news media influence people through agenda-setting. First-level agenda-setting indicates the salience of an issue or event. Second-level agenda-setting indicates the salience of certain characteristics of that issue or event (Miller and Peake 2010). My study is concerned with first-level agenda-setting. The media indicate the salience of an issue or event by how much they cover that issue or event. The events covered more usually become well-known by the average person. In essence, the media form their own agenda from their coverage of news, and this agenda passes on to the public because they prime it into their thought processes. The end result is for the public agenda to mirror the media agenda (McCombs 2004). For example, when the media covers twenty major news events, they focus more on only a few of them. Some of this coverage is on the presidency. This means the event the presidency is involved in will shift from the media agenda to the public agenda, where the public is then concerned with that event. My study assumes that the media sets the public agenda on the presidency and that the media influences the public to agree with what the media considers important about the presidency.

Priming occurs simultaneously as the media set the agenda. Priming occurs when people are conditioned by media coverage to think differently about further stimuli (McCombs 2004). In the context of my study, this means that when the news media set the agenda by covering a major event, such as the 2008 economic collapse, the public is primed by that media coverage to incorporate it more prominently into their evaluations of the president. As a result of the media’s focus on the economic malaise, people are primed to think that the president is doing a poor job handling the economy even though there might be little the president can do to help the economy. When the economy continues its downward spiral and the media constantly cover it, people are primed to change their opinion of the president and disapprove of the president’s job handling. Thus, media coverage changes public opinion due to people’s priming mechanism that conditions people to change their opinions. Research over the past few decades confirms this and shows that media significantly impact people’s opinions.

In order to measure media effects on presidential approval, I analyze the content of news coverage. My analysis will reveal the changes in media coverage of the Bush Administration. Then I can analyze the relationship between my measure of media content and the changes in Bush’s approval rate. Brody’s (1991) research shows, through his content analysis of news media, that there is a significant relationship between media coverage of the president and presidential approval for the Kennedy Administration to the George H.W. Bush Administration. From prior research on media effects, it is safe to assume that positive news for President Bush will equate to increasing approval rates and negative news will equate to decreasing approval rates.

The rest of the variables, such as the rally effect, honeymoon period, lagged approval, second term period, and divided government period, are used as control variables. This is done to control for their effects when analyzing the relationship between the media, economy, and presidential approval. The rally effect, first discovered by Mueller (1973), occurs when a foreign policy crisis and the president's response to it produces a short-term, significant increase in the president's approval rate (Mueller's 1973; Bardes 158-159; Edwards and Gallup 143).³ For the rally effect to occur, there must be little to no elite criticism in the media of the president's handling of the crisis (Brody 1991) and the approval rate cannot be too high to start (Brody 1991). The rally effect lasts for less time than normal when it occurs during a war or crisis that has little sustained public support. During most of a rally period, presidential approval trends downward and this signals the end of the rally period (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 49).

The honeymoon period automatically occurs during the first six to eight months of all new presidencies. Presidential approval during this period tends to be greater than the rest of the term for multiple reasons. First, people give the new president a chance to govern before forming opinions about the new president (Brody 28). Second, elite criticism (i.e., media, other politicians, etc...) tends to be muted during the honeymoon; thus, media initially play a minor role in influencing people (29). However, since 1975, honeymoon periods became less pronounced. Currently, honeymoon periods are not as long lasting and do not increase approval rates as much as they did before 1975 (Brody 40-42). The honeymoon period is a control variable because it likely affected Bush's approval rate during the first seven months of his presidency.

second term is important for a couple of reasons. First, presidents cannot be elected for a third term which means the president cannot campaign during the second term for a third term. The president is less flexible in his relationship with the other branches of government because the president is on a strict timetable to leave office. As a result of this, the president is known as a “lame-duck” who lacks the same amount of authority as he had in his first term. Second, presidents have significantly lower approval on average during the second term than the first term (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002). Some of this is due to the lack of a honeymoon period at the start of the second term and a growing coalition of dissatisfied supporters and opposition groups who begin to oppose the president during the first term (Mueller 1973). Exacerbating the difference in Bush’s approval rate from his first and second term are the rally periods that occurred exclusively during his first term. These factors made Bush’s approval much higher in his first term.

Divided government is another control variable that occurs when the executive and legislative branches are controlled by separate parties. For example, there is divided government when Republicans control Congress and Democrats control the presidency. This variable possibly affects the president's approval rate in two different ways. First, divided government can help increase presidential approval if the economy is prosperous (Nicholson, Segura, and Woods 2002). Second, divided government can help decrease the presidential approval if elite criticism significantly increases as a result of Congress being controlled by the opposing party (Brody 1991). For the most part, President Bush served under a unified government during his first six years as president.\textsuperscript{4} In the 2006 election, the Democratic Party gained control over both houses of Congress; thus, starting a two year period of divided government to close out his term.

My interest is in the part of the approval rate that changes, but approval normally changes little on a monthly basis. I isolate stationary approval to analyze changing approval. To do this, I include a one month lagged approval rate variable as an independent variable to control for stationary approval (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002). Including lagged approval helps clear the way towards predicting approval change.

My Model for Approval and Its Relationships

My study is a multivariate time series model for predicting presidential approval. I use monthly time series data from news media coverage of Bush, percentage change in the unemployment rate, consumer price index, and real disposable income rate. I analyze and use the control variables to properly measure the relationship between these variables. By the end of this study, I will thoroughly demonstrate that the media's coverage of the Bush Administration, the economic performance of the country, and the control variables change Bush's approval rate in a predictable manner. On the next page in Figure 1 is an illustration of my model of approval change.

Reasons to Study George W. Bush's Approval Rate

The Bush Administration's approval rate, its movement, and the reasons for that movement are worthwhile to study. First, this presidency ended recently – a little more than two years ago – which means that the study of Bush's approval rate is still

\textsuperscript{4} Technically speaking there was divided government for Bush when the Senate was controlled by the Democrats nascent, but starting to be understood through recent approval research. Second, the study of Bush's approval can shed light on multiple aspects of presidential approval. These influences on Bush's approval are from two verifiable rally periods, a honeymoon period, two terms in office, two wars, economic prosperity, and two recessions. One objective is to find out if Bush's approval rate behaved the same way as approval rates from other presidencies when encountered by those variables. Third, Bush's approval rate was unique from other presidencies because it was far more volatile than other presidents' approval rates, ranging from an all time high of 92 percent (shortly after the 9/11 terrorist attacks) to an all time low of 19 percent (at the peak of the economic collapse in September of 2008) (iPoll). These extremes in his approval rate show that many factors were involved in its movement, and understanding these factors informs the debate on the causes of presidential approval change.
Why This Is Different

My study is unique from other studies on presidential approval. First, most research on presidential approval change examines its relationship with one, two, or three variables instead of the eight variables in my study. Second, little research utilizes a longitudinal analysis in its analysis of approval. Third, only a couple of studies have detailed the changes in presidential approval during the entirety of the Bush Administration and are different from my study, meaning his approval rate is still not fully understood.

Most studies on Bush’s approval rate are similar to each other. Most focus on the rally events and the time period around those rallies. Most of them focus on the 9/11 rally event (Schubert, Stewart, and Curran 2002; Hetherington and Nelson 2003; Jacobson 2003; Kam and Ramos 2008), instead of the Iraq War rally event (Voeten and Brewer 2006; Gelpi, Feaver, and Reifler 2005/06). The studies on those rally events and the characteristics of each rally are well done, but only examine them in the context of Bush’s first term – not his full time in office.

Only one other study incorporates media effects on Bush’s approval rate. Forgette and Morris (2006) analyzed political “conflict” talk shows and their effect on presidential approval in a lab setting. Their study analyzes a small segment of the media for a short period of time in a highly controlled environment without controlling for the influence of other variables such as the economy. My study analyzes a broad segment of the media and its effect on Bush’s approval rate in a realistic setting while 5 Forgette and Morris (2006) only study one type of news media content and its affect on the president’s approval rate. The media they study does not represent the full extent of news coverage and is only focused on coverage that made it on a conflict program like CNN’s Crossfire or Fox New’s Hannity and Colmes.

controlling for all present and known variables for the entire Bush presidency.

Some studies on Bush’s approval rate are similar to mine. Fox’s (2009) study and Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo’s (2006) study are similar to mine because they both use longitudinal time series models of approval rate prediction for President Bush. However, there are crucial differences between their studies and mine. ESL (2006) use an error correction model for their variables, give Bush a honeymoon at the start of his second term, and give more rally periods; Fox (2009) uses decay effects for the 9/11 rally period and honeymoon period variables, incorporates an Iraq War casualty rate variable, and uses a different set of economic variables; both use Bush’s approval rate from partisan subgroups, do not include Granger causality tests, and do not incorporate media effects on Bush’s approval rate. All of those differences combined together are significant. Nevertheless, I am interested in seeing how my results and their results match up.

Other research that is similar to mine is focused on multiple presidencies’ approval rates. In the near future, I will test my variables on a number of approval rates for recent presidents. Out of research that compares multiple presidencies, the most similar to mine is Brody’s (1991) approval study. The primary differences between our studies are my Bush’s media coverage variable is more accurate than his presidential media coverage variable and we use some different macroeconomic indicators. To sum up, my research breaks new ground with the type of variables used, how these variables are measured, and the statistical tests used for my time series analysis of the recent George W. Bush Presidency. I believe these differences will produce a more reliable and accurate predictor of presidential approval.

Looking Ahead…

In the next chapter, I concentrate on reviewing the literature that analyzes the relationship between presidential approval, the media, the economy, and the control variables. I examine the evolution of research on these variables and show how much previous research influences my research design. In the third chapter, I focus on George W. Bush’s approval rate, the events surrounding his presidency, and hypotheses on how my independent variables likely influenced his approval rate. I explain my analysis of media content, operationalize media coverage of Bush, and define the parameters of my other variables. In the fourth chapter, I explain the time series methods I use for my study and explain how I manipulate the variables through the statistical analyses. Then I test my data to find its characteristics and decide on further tests. In chapter five, I run statistical tests and present these results. I explain the results and what they show about the relationships among the variables. I also construct a graphical representation that shows my model of the independent variables and Bush’s actual approval rate. In my final chapter, I compare my results to other similar studies and show how Bush’s approval and presidency are distinct from other presidencies and their approval rates. I analyze how my study contributes to approval research, how my results fit in the approval literature, how I can improve my study, and how my study can be used in future research.

LITERATURE REVIEW: WHAT EFFECTS OPINION CHANGE OF THE PRESIDENCY

My literature review explains the body of research on what affects approval change from its inception to recent times. I explain how the president’s approval rate is affected by media coverage, the economy, rally events, honeymoon period, divided government period, and second term period from previous research. The research on approval rate change gives many plausible explanations for approval change. For the most part, these types of approval change are associated with different variables. As a result, I show how presidential approval relates to each of these variables from previous research. Furthermore, this chapter shows where my research on approval change is situated among approval research.

Changes in News Media Coverage of Presidencies and Presidential Campaigns

The news media play a pivotal role in my presidential approval research because previous research shows that the media affect public opinion of the president. This section shows from prior research the effects news media have on people’s opinions and how it relates to my study of media influence on George W. Bush’s approval rate. I offer an extensive review of media effects on public opinion literature because there are few studies that link presidential approval change to change in news media coverage. I start off by giving a short history of the modern news media and explaining the changes in media and its relationship to people. Then I explain the theory with the most convincing evidence that backs up my media coverage of Bush variable and shows the relationship between media and public opinion. I explain the mechanics of agenda-setting and priming to show how the media change people’s opinions. As long as the link between media coverage and opinion change is strong there is a very good chance the media affect whether or not people approve of the president.

In the last forty years, the relationship changed between presidential candidates, politics, and the media. News coverage of presidential campaigns increased as parties lost a degree of control over the campaign and nomination process due to the rise of the primary process. Primaries became common in the 1970s as state legislatures changed their electoral laws (Patterson 1993). This change led to a seemingly continuous campaign because there is little difference in publicity for a presidential candidate and a sitting president (Ragsdale 1998:149). As a result, candidates are more independent of their parties and politics is more candidate-centered (Ragsdale 1998:33).

Research supports and many believe a more adversarial relationship between the presidency and media developed because of the Vietnam War and the Watergate Scandal in the early 1970s (Miller and Peake 2010; Shea et. al. 376, 2009; Grossman and Kumar 1981). For instance, Brody’s (1991, 152) content analysis of media coverage of the president revealed that news media became more negative from 1961 to 1980. A possible reason, other than Watergate and Vietnam, is the strong correlation between increasing numbers of cable news networks and increasing negative news coverage of the presidency (Cohen 2008:105). Most of this can be attributed to people’s perception of the news coverage rather than bias. For instance, people’s expectations of the president affect their view of the news stories of the president because they may think the news is more negative than it really is when they have high expectations (Brody 1991, 138-139). When expectations are unmet, people lose faith in the president Political “conflict” shows have grown in popularity and their viewing is associated with a decrease in trust and approval of the government, including the president, due to the combative and negative tone of the shows (Forgette and Morris 2006). However, the conflict shows are geared more toward entertainment purposes than knowledge dispersal. Increasing negative media coverage of the president is linked to decreasing presidential approval.

Other research reinforces the evidence that changing media coverage affects public opinion. During the 1992 presidential campaign the media reported more negative stories about President Bush and more positive stories about Governor Clinton. This influenced people to view Clinton more positively and Bush more negatively; thus, changing people’s views on these candidates (Joslyn and Ceccoli 1996, 163). This does not necessarily mean that the media is biased. Dalton, Beck, and Huckfeldt (1998) found that the news media was mostly objective during the 1992 presidential campaign because they covered events and rarely aired their opinions of the candidates. This means the coverage of events is what influenced people’s opinions of the candidates. Thus far, most research has found the news media to be neutral toward presidential candidates (Ansolabehere, Behr, and Iyengar 1993, 64). It is possible for certain organizations to be biased for a short period of time, but a predominant media bias is difficult to find.

Technological Changes in the News Media

The advances in technology and the resultant growth in media options in the past forty years led to three major developments. First, there is a growing saturation of media in the average American’s life. Second, the news cycle is shortening and events are covered almost instantaneously. Third, there is a growing variety of media options that decreases the effect of each single media option on the aggregate population.

Narrow-casting\(^7\) results in a large variety of news programming that focus on soft news, hard news, or both. Soft news has a long shelf life and primarily disperses entertainment over knowledge. Hard news focuses on news with a short shelf life and disperses knowledge over entertainment (Tuchman 1978). One concern is soft news disengages people from being politically aware (Prior 2003, 2005, 2007). Nevertheless, political knowledge has grown and declined among different segments of the population resulting in little aggregate change in political knowledge. Also, during the recent 2004 and 2008 presidential elections, monitors saw increased voting turnout at levels not seen since the early 1960s. Even though the media environment is changing rapidly, it has not significantly changed the number of people who follow the news or the news media’s effects on people’s opinions.

Newspaper, radio, television (TV), and internet provide news content to Americans. Newspaper is the oldest form of news media, then radio, TV, and finally internet, which until recently was not widely available. All four types of media set the agenda and prime. Television currently has the broadest audience. To elaborate on TV’s popularity, “…, in 2005, the television is on for eight hours per day on 2.6 screens in the average household. (Prior 2007, 2)” Television makes a big difference to politics in a few ways. First, TV appeals to a broad audience because of visual cues, cheap information delivery, large amounts of information, and variety in what to watch (West 2001). Having a greater choice in TV channels is the result of narrow-casting (West

\(^7\) Narrow-casting is when media providers make shows that appeal to specific demographics and people in these demographics follow these shows instead of watching something with broader appeal.
Much of this goes into the realm of cable and satellite TV where, “Over 85 percent of all households subscribe to cable or satellite television. The average viewer has a choice of about 100 channels. (Prior 2007, 2)” Second, TV emphasizes candidates and politicians more than their political parties (Patterson 1993). The internet is the most recent media source that, in itself, vastly expands narrow-casting. By increasing its coverage of the presidency, the media increased its agenda-setting ability which strengthens its relationship with public opinion change of the presidency.

Trends in Media Influence on Public Opinion

The agenda-setting theory is a well supported and widely accepted explanation of media effects on people’s behavior. Media set the agenda by giving more attention to certain stories over others, thereby making people regard those stories as more important than others (Iyengar and Kinder 16). Much research shows that people begin to think about the same stories the news media cover when exposed to them for a certain amount of time (Iyengar, Peters, and Kinder 110-111; Iyengar and Kinder 24, 26). As a rule, the longer one is exposed to a story, the more important he or she will rate it relative to other stories (Iyengar and Kinder 33). For instance, when a large number of negative stories are about the president, observers will tend to think more negatively about him.

There are other aspects to agenda-setting such as story placement within media and shared themes among stories. When setting the agenda, a story leading off the broadcast or on the front page of the newspaper is thought of as more important by people observing the news (Iyengar and Kinder 44-45). A newspaper or magazine article’s print size and photographs help determine its importance (Cohen 2008: 61-63). Television news media manipulate the importance of news stories by allotting more or less time, using pictures, video-clips, and words. Through these methods, the consumer is able to tell what news is more important (Brody 110). Agenda-setting also occurs when news media report on events thematically. News media normally link stories under the same theme when they report on similar events. Themes help publicize stories that fit under the same theme as other prominent stories, and they tend to set the agenda and stay in one’s memory longer (Patterson 2003).

Agenda-setting is not an instant process and its effects are relatively short term. For most news, the time lag is one month from when the agenda becomes prominent in the media to when it is prominent among the public (McCombs 43). Neuman’s (1990) research shows that agenda-setting will not occur unless the amount of media coverage on it is large enough, and once media coverage reaches that threshold the story will automatically influence public opinion. This means if a story is featured prominently and for long enough, its chance of public opinion changing and crossing that threshold increases. The movement from the media agenda to the public agenda occurs quicker on the internet than other types of media. Leskovec, Backstrom, and Kleinberg (2009) found that mainstream internet news media report on news two and a half hours before informal internet networks (i.e. blogs, Facebook, etc…) communicate that news. This evidence is more proof that the media agenda passes to the public agenda. On the next page is a diagram showing the transfer of salience from the media agenda to the public agenda.

Accompanying agenda-setting is priming. Priming occurs when stimuli condition people to think differently about further stimuli. Priming occurs during agenda-setting when the media agenda becomes the public agenda. Priming produces opinions of varying strengths due to conditioning from news coverage that leads people to change their behavior depending on their preexisting opinions and the strength of those opinions (McCombs 2004). For instance, when the media set the agenda for an event such as the Iraq War by giving it a lot of coverage, people are primed to evaluate the president by the war's progress. The more the media cover that event, the more people evaluate the president from what is occurring with that event (Krosnick and Kinder 1990). When they report on a series of events in the war that are negative, people are primed to think that the president is handling the war poorly. As a result, they become less supportive of the president. Priming is ineffective when people's exposure to the news media is limited (Mondak 1995), yet that is rare in the United States. Krosnick and Kinder (1990; 509) argue, “Priming provides an empirically grounded, psychologically plausible account of how individuals form and revise their views of presidential performance.” The news media, by setting the agenda and priming, create salient issues and their context that affect how people evaluate the president and his handling of these issues (Iyengar, Peters, and Kinder 1982).

Below in Figure 3 is a model of media’s influence on the public. Figure 3 illustrates the role of priming and agenda-setting influencing opinion/behavior change. Once the event or issue becomes salient, it becomes primed into our thinking to reinforce or change our opinions and affect our behavior.

Priming occurs among all demographic groups (Iyengar et. al. 1982). However, some research shows that different demographic groups are primed differently with some being primed more than others. For instance, political novices were primed more than knowledgeable political observers from media coverage of the Iran-Contra scandal (Krosnick and Kinder 1990). The end result of agenda-setting and priming is to change our thoughts and behavior. My study assumes that agenda-setting and priming occur in the aggregate population because news media coverage influences most people to think similarly when regularly exposed to the media.

There are two critiques of agenda-setting theory being the media does not always set the agenda and the event sets the agenda instead of the media. Presidents try to project a strong and positive image in the media through public speaking to appear decisive when responding to issues and events in the public domain (Grossman and Kumar 1981). These activities can produce a short term bump in the approval rate, but little to no long term effect on the approval rate (Cohen and Hamman 141, Brody 144). Most evidence finds that the media, not the government or president, set the agenda and transfer event salience to the public. The other criticism is the events that media report on is what changes opinion and not the media’s coverage of events. Evidence shows this criticism is mistaken because news media focus on events and stories before they become important to the public, meaning that until the media publicize something only then does the event become important to the public (McCombs 23). This is evident in Fan’s (1988) analysis of the news media’s effect on public opinion. His content analysis of news media coverage links news media coverage to public opinion change for six public policies in a longitudinal analysis. He found that as news media covered these issues public opinion began to mirror the media coverage of those issues. In other words, when coverage is predominately negative about a policy then positive attitudes will decrease toward that policy as a result of that coverage (Fan 1988). This preceding research shows that the media have a strong and predictable effect on public opinion change.

10 It is definitely not the case that the public agenda causes the media agenda. Panel studies have shown that the media changes people’s opinions on what is the most important issue (McCombs 16-19).

Media Effects on Presidential Approval

Most media effects research on presidential public opinion focus on media’s effects on presidential campaigns and vote choice. Few focus directly on the relationship between media effects and presidential approval. The first was Brody and Page (1975) who found that events such as war deaths and economic news among others covered by the news media affect public opinion of the presidency and that an analysis of news media coverage can help better predict presidential approval. So when news is good for the president, the president's approval rate will increase and vice-versa (Brody and Page 1975). Brody's (1991) book, Assessing The President, clearly links the change in news coverage of the president to changes in presidential approval. His content analysis of the news media is relatively rudimentary because he only analyzes one story per day. In my study, I seek to find this link between media effects and approval by including a significantly larger number of top news stories per day. Brody (1991) coded news stories that concern the presidency negative one, positive one, or neutral zero. I use some of the same rules as Brody in determining whether coverage of the presidency is positive, negative, or neutral. My news sources are different than Brody's, but the audiences for our news sources are similar because we both try for a broad American audience. Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson's (2002) research is similar to Brody's; however, they used computer textual analysis programs, whereas Brody manually coded his news stories by reading them attentively and understanding the president's relationship to them. I refer to this variable as Bush's media coverage variable or media coverage of Bush variable because of its intent to measure how Bush is covered by the media.

The Media's Coverage of the Economy

News media cover the economy and that coverage plays a significant role in our evaluations of the president. Economic news affects the president’s approval rate to a significant degree (McAvoy 2006, Burden and Mughan 2003) through sociotropic evaluations (Kinder and Kiewiet 1981). For example, positive economic news coverage helped increase President Clinton’s approval rate despite the Lewinsky scandal (Shah et al. 2002). Economic news and character stories about the president are more likely to change presidential approval than policy stories (Kelleher and Wolak 2006). Economic news stories reflect the actual economy, but the media are less likely to report on a strong economy than a weak one. When the news media report negative over positive economic news, people are less likely to approve of the president (Goidel and Langley 1995) because people tend to concentrate on negative economic news more than positive economic news. This results in negative economic coverage having a greater impact on peoples’ evaluations of the president (Lanoue 4). Nevertheless, presidential approval may increase when the media cover the president trying to fix the economy (Kinder 1981). Economic news coverage gives the public a reason, fairly or unfairly, to implicate the president in the economy’s success or failure. This intersection between the media, economy, and president is further explained in the next section on the economy.

The Economy and Presidential Popularity

The economy, beyond what is in the news, similarly affects people’s opinions of the president. This is because most people believe the president has some responsibility for the condition of the national economy. As a result, people reward and punish the president for the state of the economy. When the economy significantly grows at a sustained rate for a certain amount of time, presidential approval should increase. On the other hand, a weak economy with little or decreasing growth should yield decreasing approval rates. President Bush experienced both good and bad economies during different periods in his presidency. In this section, I show how the economy affects public opinion of the president from previous research. First, I show why people believe the president is responsible for the country’s economic performance and how the president is partly responsible for the U.S. economy.

Presidential Power over the Economy

Presidents usually affect the economy directly through their monetary and fiscal policies. The president uses the Department of Treasury and Federal Reserve among other agencies to guide fiscal and monetary policy. Monetary policy is indirectly controlled by the presidency through the appointment of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors, Chairperson, and a host of others in the Federal Reserve System. Fiscal policy is controlled by the president through the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). The IRS is responsible for raising revenue for the national government and is under the authority of the Department of Treasury. The OMB is responsible for government spending and is under the authority of the Executive Office of the President (EOP). The OMB does not decide the budget because Congress has more authority than the president in taxation and spending policies with the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) among other agencies and committees (Dautrich and Yalof 2009, 432-440). With these tools, the president has much influence over taxation and spending policies.

People want a president who tailors government policies to enhance economic prosperity. However, if it were this easy, presidencies would always be able to ensure economic growth. Normally the president is unsuccessful in managing the economy and is usually responding to changing economic conditions instead of economic conditions responding to presidential action. Since the president is unable to systematically affect the economy, the president is unable to affect his approval rate through his manipulation of economic growth.

Theories on the Relationship between the Economy and Presidential Approval

There are two theories that explain how and why people link economic performance to their approval of the president. First, when people are personally affected by a poor economy, they politicize their economic situation by assigning blame to their political leaders. However, few do this because it is almost impossible to assign specific blame to a politician for one's personal economic situation (Brody 97, 107-108; Lanoue 26-27). This is much more of an exception than the norm. The second way the economy affects people’s opinion of the presidency is through sociotropic economic evaluations (Brody 97, 109).

As I pointed out earlier, the media affects public opinion of the economy through sociotropic economic evaluations. These are the evaluations people make about the economy and the country’s leaders effect on it with information from external sources, such as the media and local stimuli (Kinder 1981; Kinder and Kiewiet 1981). Through those stimuli, people see the economy as an impersonal force and attribute responsibility for the state of the economy on leaders for their part in the economic situation. A battery of tests shows that people change their opinion of the president much more often from sociotropic economic evaluations than they do from their personal economic situations. When voting, some people make a sociotropic economic evaluation because they think of the economy as a public good and the government as its steward (Kinder and Kiewiet 1979, Kinder 1981). Kinder and Kiewiet (1981) assert, “…information about national conditions is typically conveyed at a level of abstraction appropriate to nationally-oriented political judgments.” This is consistent with the dominant psychological literature on the subject (Kinder and Kiewiet 1981). The practical justification for sociotropic evaluations shows a strong relationship between the state of the national economy and public opinion of the president.

When people evaluate the president sociotropically, the news media play a significant role in affecting public opinion on the president’s handling of the economy. This is because the more the media cover an issue, the more recognition it gets from people who develop opinions on the president’s handling of it (Brody 1991, 109; De Boef and Kellstedt 2004). For instance, De Boef and Kellstedt (2004) found that media coverage of government deficits and the federal funds rate influences how people view the president’s handling of the economy; thus, affecting the president’s overall approval rate if the media sustain their coverage. As a result of sociotropic evaluations, media coverage of the president’s handling of the economy helps determine his approval.

Sociotropic Economic Evaluations of the President: Past, Present, and Future

Sociotropic evaluations of the president’s economic policy come in a combination of three types being: retrospective (past) evaluations, present evaluations, and prospective (future) evaluation. MacKuen, Erikson, and Stimson (1992) argue that people usually judge the president’s handling of the economy prospectively, by how they think the president will affect the economy in the near future. This happens because presidential approval changes before the economy changes and almost always in the direction of where the economy is heading (e.g. when the economy declines approval decreases prior to that economic decline) (MacKuen, Erikson, and Stimson 1992).\(^\text{13}\) A different sociotropic model finds that present economic evaluations from media coverage change the public’s views of how the president will handle the economy (Nadeau et. al. 1999).

Others argue that the public judges the president's economic handling retrospectively and prospectively and not on the president’s current handling of the economy (Clarke and Stewart 1994). This finding has a bevy of research supporting it in addition to Clark and Stewart (1994). The media sometimes increase the likelihood of retrospective evaluations by reporting on retrospective economic news as they likely did during the 1992 presidential campaign. As a result, people were more likely to think retrospectively when evaluating Bush’s handling of the economy and decided not to approve of Bush or vote for him (Hetherington 1996). Norpoth (1996) agrees and argues that presidential approval depends on retrospective evaluations because prospective evaluations of the economy are logically dependent on retrospective evaluations and government action in the economy (Norpoth 1996).

Most evidence indicates that people make sociotropic evaluations of the economy and the president’s handling of it. People lack perfect knowledge of what is currently occurring in the economy and this means sometimes their evaluations of the current economic state carry little validity. It makes sense that people get economic news that is a week or a few weeks old and that news is the retrospective information that they use to make retrospective evaluations of the president. Essentially, people desire a president who had a growing economy and disdain a president who had a shrinking economy. That is why I believe retrospective and prospective sociotropic evaluations are used to assess the president’s handling of the economy and his job.

\(^{13}\) This does not mean approval change causes economic change. It means that the movement in approval may predict where the economy is heading.

Influence on Approval: Inflation, Unemployment, and Personal Income

An easier way to find the state of the U.S. economy than analyzing news media economic coverage is to use macroeconomic indicators. Only three macroeconomic indicators are consistently linked to presidential approval. Several studies show that changes in inflation (Monroe 1978; Kernell 1978; Hibbs 1982; and Norpoth 1984), real disposable income (Hibbs 1982; Lanoue 1987), and unemployment (Hibbs 1982; MacKuen 1983) are significantly related to changes in presidential approval and voting behavior. According to Brody (103), these macroeconomic indicators affected eight out of ten presidents’ approval rates. However, the economic indicators can only influence approval under certain conditions. According to Hibbs, Rivers, and Vasilatos (1982b), macroeconomic indicators have negligible effects on approval when measured under a two year time span or when there is mixed growth over a two year time span. Any time longer than two years of sustained growth or decline in these macroeconomic indicators allows for substantial rewards and penalties for the president’s approval rate (Hibbs, Rivers, and Vasilatos 1982b). However, Monroe’s (1978) research shows the time period can be under two years. For example, a one percent increase in inflation occurring for one year can significantly decrease presidential approval (Monroe 1978).

Party identification significantly determines whether people approve or disapprove of the president’s handling of the economy. For instance, when the unemployment rate increases, people who share their party identification with the president are less likely to disapprove of the president than someone who is of the other party (Mueller 1973, 250). When inflation increases, presidential approval stays stable among Democrats and Independents and decreases among Republicans (Brody 1991). During the last three presidencies and Obama’s presidency, these partisan differences have increased (De Boef and Kellstedt 2004; Jacobson 2010; Rasmussen Reports 12/16/2010). The current norm is for Republicans and Democrats to disapprove of presidents from opposing parties and approve of presidents from their own party because they share the same party affiliation and ideals. This did not affect Bush’s approval rate because the proportions of the public that are Democrat, Republican, and Independent have stayed relatively the same during his time in office.

Control Variables

There are some variables that predictably or unpredictably affect presidential approval. The ones that move approval in a predictable direction are the rally effect, honeymoon period, and second term. Approval increases, or is greater on average, during the rally and honeymoon periods and decreases, or is lower on average, during the second term period. Divided government can help to decrease or increase presidential approval.

The Rally Effect

The rally effect is known to significantly increase presidential approval. Other criteria for the rally effect consists of it being international, involving primarily the president, and being specific and dramatic (Mueller 1973: 209). The rally effect occurred for Presidents Truman (Korean War), Eisenhower (Suez crisis), Kennedy (Cuban missile crisis), Johnson (Dominican Republic crisis), Nixon (Cambodia Invasion), Ford (Mayaguez affair), Carter (Camp David summit), George H.W. Bush (the Persian Gulf War), Clinton (Haiti Crisis) (Erickson et. al. 145; Bardes 167), and George W. Bush (9/11 Terrorist Attacks and Iraq War) (Schubert, Stewart, and Curran 2002). Republican presidents have had more rally effects, on average, than Democratic presidents (Baum 2002). A rally event is usually measured by the percentage change in the president's approval rate and the amount of time it takes for approval to get back to within two percentage points of its pre-rally level (Lee 1977). Mueller (1973, 210) identified five types of international events that can lead to rally events: sudden military interventions in a foreign country, major military developments in a current war, major diplomatic developments, major technological developments, and summit meetings between the head of the Soviet Union and the U.S. President. Much has changed since Mueller’s analysis; nevertheless, rally events still play by many of the same rules.

Interestingly there is no correlation between who is president, the percent change in presidential approval, and the duration of the rally event (Lee 1977). Rally event approval decay starts right after approval peaks in the initial portion of the rally period and by the end of the first month of the rally period presidential approval decreases 11.5 percent (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 54). During the 9/11 rally event, Bush’s approval rate increase decayed, but took much longer than the average rally event decay.

Rally events increase presidential approval among all partisan groups (Kam and Ramos 2008), yet James and Rioux (1998) argue that the opposition party usually does not rally. The most recent evidence shows from the 9/11 and Iraq War rally events that all groups rally because Democrats and Independents were a large part of Republican George W. Bush's rallies in approval (Baum 2002). When Bush's approval went through rally event decay Democrats and then Independents stopped approving of Bush, while Republicans maintained high levels of approval (Kam and Ramos 2008). If anything, all groups join the rally and when it decays the opposing groups significantly leave the rally.

The success or failure of the president's response to the foreign policy crisis does not necessarily affect the likelihood of a rally event (Lee 253; Mueller 212; James and Rioux 1998). A potential rally event and presidential action that the public favors bring about the rally effect. One without the other will not bring about a rally event (Peffley, Langley, and Goidel 1995). For example, when Bush addressed the nation on the night of the 9/11 attacks that action propelled his approval rate into rally territory and became the largest rally ever with little to no division in the demographic makeup of Bush supporters (Schubert, Stewart, and Curran 2002).

Rally events can also be dependent variables. Positive media coverage outweighing negative media coverage of the president, a sufficient amount of news media coverage dedicated to the rally event, and an approval rate not too high facilitate the occurrence of the rally effect. In order for the rally effect to occur, positive elite commentary (i.e., politicians and pundits) must outweigh negative elite commentary (Edwards and Gallup 151) and there must be a large amount of media coverage on this potential rally event (Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo 2006). Normally during a crisis, the media is not adversarial toward the political leaders. Instead, they rally around the presidency to restore order, safety, and tranquility (Graber 1997, 152). Supporting this Brody (63) argues, “when events are breaking at an unusually rapid pace, when the administration has a virtual monopoly of information about the situation, opposition political leaders tend to refrain from comment or to make cautiously supportive statements.” When the media report what they see they are being objective; however, this reinforces the rally effect (64). Brody (67-78) finds a pattern of elite/news media commentary influencing people’s approval of the president during a rally event. However, when elite commentary is evenly divided, people judge the president on the success or failure of his policies which decreases the likelihood of a rally effect (78). When a president already has a high approval rate, he is less likely to have a rally effect. The higher the approval rate, the more likely a rally will not occur (151). For example, the 9/11 rally was the largest rally effect ever recorded due to low approval by Democrats, a poor economy, divided government, and low approval for a new president (Baum 2002).

The Honeymoon Period

The period from when one first becomes president to the six to eight month mark is known as the honeymoon period. Public opinion during this period tends to be more favorable towards the president because people are giving the new president a chance and taking time to form opinions about the president (Brody 28). People want to give the president enough time to enact his policies and put his imprint on our government before judging him. Elites mirror the public attitude during a honeymoon period. Elite criticism (i.e., media, other politicians) tends to be muted early in a president’s term; thus, reinforcing the effect of the honeymoon period (Brody 29). About half of Americans are supportive of a new president and the other half are strong partisans who either support or oppose the president no matter what happens (38). Nevertheless, people who vote for the losing presidential candidate tend to view the winning candidate in a more positive light during the honeymoon period (Edwards and Gallup 125). New presidents tend to blame their current problems on the previous presidency and most people agree until enough time has passed when most believe the president's problems are his own.

During the honeymoon period, a slow and steady decline in the approval rate occurs. Brody (83) explains, “Only three of the thirteen presidential terms since 1945 (the two Eisenhower terms and President Reagan’s first term) have failed to show a clear trend of loss of support for the incumbent.” There are some reasons why this happens. First, people, media, and elites become more critical of the president, as the president's honeymoon period wears off (Brody 1991). Second, presidents make campaign promises they do not or cannot keep and that disappoint many Americans. Many people's expectations are unrealistic because they misunderstand the details of the president's job (Stimson 1976: 9-10). Third, as explained earlier, people form a “coalition-of-minorities” where opposing groups including former supporters combine together to oppose the president; thus, helping decrease presidential approval (Mueller 1971; Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 36).

Presidential approval during the honeymoon period is noticeably lower on average than it was prior to the Nixon presidency (40-42). This is likely due to the increase in negative news coverage of the presidency and the more adversarial relationship between the presidency and media. The media have been more investigative and critical of the presidency since the Vietnam War and Watergate scandal (43). Presidents who win a second term do not get another honeymoon period like they did in the first term (Brody 36). If there appears to be a honeymoon period at the start of the second term, it does not last long unless it is the result of extraordinary circumstances. A second term president is more exposed to criticism by elites and negative news coverage. This is due to the president having a track record from the first term (31).

Second Terms and Divided Government

The second term is noticeably different from the first term as far as how the president is viewed by the news media, elites, and the public. This is relevant to my study because Bush’s presidency lasted two terms. A campaigning president will be in front of the American electorate trying to raise his popularity. However, a second term president can no longer run for the presidency. He becomes known as a “lame duck” and this makes it more difficult for the president to successfully govern because he must leave office at a set date. This decreases presidential approval because second terms are accompanied by greater negative media coverage, no re-election campaigns, and decreasing power relative to Congress as a “lame duck”. Cunion (133) found that presidents try to avoid political battles in the second term even though he tries to lead public opinion. This makes the president appear weak and does not help his approval rate. Second terms, on average, are correlated with declining approval rates (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002). Another challenge to the presidency and its approval occurs when the opposing party controls the Congress.

Divided government occurs when one political party controls Congress and the other political party controls the presidency. During the Bush Presidency from 2003 to 2007, there was a period of unified government where Republicans controlled both houses of Congress and the presidency. From June 2001 to 2003, Democrats controlled the Senate by a very narrow margin but not the House of Representatives. Fully divided government occurred from 2007 to 2009 because Democrats regained control of both the House and Senate in the 2006 midterm elections. During divided government it is more difficult for a president to successfully implement his policies. Also congressional opponents are more prominent and critical of the president in the media. However, divided government can help the president’s approval rate because people are less likely to blame the presidency for the nation’s problems because Congress is controlled by the opposing party. This happened when Democratic President Bill Clinton’s approval increased as he battled the Republican Congress from the mid to late 1990s (Nicholson, Segura, and Woods 2002).

Moving Forward…

My review of literature explored every variable in my study that significantly changes presidential approval. The growing media effects literature shows that news media play an important role in conditioning people’s evaluations of the presidency. It appears the link between media coverage and opinion change is as strong as ever. The literature on the economy affecting presidential approval change shows the economy affects approval but likely not to the same extent as media coverage. Nevertheless, the evaluations on the past, present, and future state of the economy can be a significant predictor of approval. The control variables are helpful in isolating the effects the media and economy have on presidential approval; however, I am unsure as to how important some control variables are in affecting presidential approval. According to the literature, the rally effect followed by the honeymoon period and second term period have the strongest effect on presidential approval out of the control variables. The divided government period is accounted for just in case it does affect Bush’s approval. The current state of approval research shows a growing understanding of what causes approval change, but little research seeks to anticipate changes in the approval. My goal is to use these variables to anticipate approval change.

The next step in my study is to detail the variables in the context of the Bush Presidency and how they appear to interact with approval rate. I detail the behavior of the variables and construct hypotheses based on my review of research and how the variables appear to affect Bush’s approval. Finally, I explain my coding techniques for media coverage of the presidency and my operationalization of Bush’s media coverage variable.
INITIAL OBSERVATIONS OF BUSH’S APPROVAL RATE

The Bush presidency dealt with an onslaught of positive and negative stimuli that affected Bush’s approval rate. In this chapter, I analyze these variables and their characteristics, and this information allows me to make predictions about the relationships among the variables. I attempt to explain why approval moved during the Bush presidency by going through some of the descriptive elements of the data and using literature on the Bush Administration. I examine some of the major events during Bush’s presidency, such as the 9/11 rally, War on Terrorism, Afghanistan War, Iraq War rally, and Iraq War, to see what effects they had on approval. I analyze the economic cycles, show graphs of my macroeconomic variables for the length of Bush’s presidency, find some preliminary relationships among the macroeconomic variables and Bush’s approval, operationalize the macroeconomic variables. Since the media play an influential role in opinion change, I explain my content analysis, operationalize news media coverage of Bush, formulate my coding scheme, and show graphs of my Bush’s media coverage rating for the length of Bush’s presidency.

All of these organizations are leaders in polling people on newsworthy information. Their wording for the approval survey question these organizations ask is, “Do you approve or disapprove of the way George W. Bush is handling his job as President?” All of these organizations are used by iPoll because they ask the same question. During certain times, such as major news events that involve the president (i.e. war, elections, etc…), there will be larger numbers of approval polls taking place at the same time. Most of these polling organizations run their approval polls for two or more days. 1446 of these polls were conducted during the Bush Presidency which averages out to 180.75 approval polls per year and 14.9 approval polls per month (iPoll).

Graph 1, on the next page, displays the monthly approval rate for the Bush Presidency. This includes arrows and labels pointing out significant dates when events significant to Bush’s approval rate occurred. Even though Bush’s approval rate moved dramatically during his time in office, there is also a large inertial component to it meaning that approval changes little, on average, month to month.

The Bush Presidency experienced three stages of public opinion attitudes that try to explain Bush’s changing approval rate. They are the pre-9/11 attacks partisan division, post-9/11 opinion unanimity, and the Iraq War partisan divide. During Bush’s presidency, his administration constantly administered and studied polls like previous presidencies. However, President Bush distanced himself from the polling operations to give an appearance of not being led by polls (Heith 77). Even though Bush was not involved in polling, his subordinates were. His polling operations concentrated on constituency building and rhetorical design for presidential communication to get his policies accepted by enough Americans (80). Bush’s polling operations tried to build a broader coalition so he could avoid a repeat of the 2000 election where he lost the popular vote and barely won the electoral vote. The polling operations built coalitions for many of Bush’s policies. However, the coalition supporting the Iraq War did not last long after it was repackaged as a humanitarian effort to instill a democratic government, since the removal of weapons of mass destruction was no longer a reasonable justification for war (82). Also research found U.S. casualties in the Iraq War to be inversely correlated with Bush’s approval rate, as causalities increase approval decreases (Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo 2006). As a matter of fact, Bush’s approval rate decreased from U.S. causalities quicker than approval of past administrations. That war among other negative events contributed to the decrease in Bush's approval rate and nullified some of the benefits of his polling operations.

Bush and his public relations team also did not help his approval rate when they miscommunicated his agenda and policies. This exposed him to criticism and jokes in the media. Nevertheless, he was able to have a few great moments in opinion leadership such as during the aftermath of 9/11 to the lead-up of the Iraq War (Mayer and Rozell 221). After the Iraq War rally his opportunities to communicate opinion leadership decreased and several problems plagued his administration. Even rhetorical changes recommended by Bush’s polling operations could not reverse his decrease in approval.

There are a number of possibilities as to why Bush’s approval continually decreased. First, Bush may have disagreed with his polling operation’s advice over his public rhetoric. Second, if Bush followed the polling operation’s advice, they failed at increasing his popularity. As the literature suggests, the president’s rhetoric may have an insignificant impact on his approval (Simon and Ostrom Jr. 1989, Brody 1991). Bush’s character and personality were initially not a liability, but by the end of his second term many Americans began to distrust him or think he was incompetent at his job. Initially most Americans had a positive view of the president’s character, especially after 9/11, but by early in his second term these evaluations turned negative (Morin and Balz 11/4/2005; Jacobson 2008, 148). Third, after the Iraq War rally event there were no other rally events for the rest of Bush’s presidency to help increase his approval rate. Fourth, there was really no change in partisan identification during the Bush Presidency. Polarization was no different from when he entered office (Jacobson 2003) and perhaps worsened in the aftermath of the Iraq War over partisan divisions (Jacobson 2008). A coalition of partisans dissatisfied with Bush, first Democratic and then Independent, arose because of the decay of the 9/11 and Iraq War rally effects. The growing unpopularity of the Iraq War helped contribute to this coalition. Then some Republicans and more Independents became dissatisfied with Bush once the economy went into recession in 2007 (Fox 2009).

Variables that changed Bush's approval rate are examined in the context of the Bush Administration. The second term and divided government periods are similar because they both share some of the same time period and both experience the phenomenon of declining approval. During Bush’s second term, his approval was at its highest of 57 percent on February 2-6\textsuperscript{th} 2005, hit a low of 19 percent on September 16-19\textsuperscript{th} 2008, and averaged out to 36 percent. The divided government period, during the latter half of Bush’s second term, saw Bush’s approval peak at 42 percent on January 8-11\textsuperscript{th} 2007, hit a low of 19 percent on September 16-19\textsuperscript{th} 2008, and averaged out to 31 percent. The honeymoon period of the Bush presidency was relatively unremarkable with his approval rating fluctuating between 44 and 63 percent and averaging out at 55 percent (iPoll). These approval numbers are similar to the more modest honeymoon period approval rates for presidents beginning in the 1970s. Bush’s honeymoon period started January 20\textsuperscript{th} 2001 and ended July 1\textsuperscript{st} 2001. Not long after the honeymoon period ended, the 9/11 terrorist attacks took place. These attacks were Bush’s first rally event. The 9/11 rally effect was very long, starting September 11th 2001 and ending March 31st 2002. This rally caused a large increase in his approval rate with a high of 92 percent on October 8-9th 2001 and a low of 61 percent January 31st to February 3rd 2002 (iPoll). According to Hetherington and Nelson (2003), the rally effect had more to do with President Bush’s actions after the initial event. They argue that increased trust in government and little change in party identification did not help his approval rate. However, with the help of this rally event, the President was able to gain a greater number of Republicans in Congress during the 2002 midterm elections (Hetherington and Nelson 2003).

Another smaller rally occurred after the start of the Iraq War. This rally started on March 20th 2003 and ended May 31st 2003, and did not increase approval as much or last as long as the first rally. During this rally, approval peaked at 77 percent on April 8-9th 2003 and was at its lowest of 48 percent on March 20th 2003 right when the rally started. A more credible approval low was 51 percent on May 6-8th and 20-22th 2003. The rally periods are monthly variables like the rest of the variables in this study. This means that before September 11th 2001 and March 20th 2003, the respective 10 and 19 days are included and alter Bush’s average approval rates and Bush’s media coverage ratings during those first months of the two rally periods. This is not a major concern over the entire rally period due to the length of each rally being over sixty days long. The average approval rate during September, 2001 in the first rally was 80 percent and March, 2003 in the second rally was 64 percent. It somewhat diminishes the accuracy of the rally period during the first month of the second rally but not by much and does not affect the first rally at all.
For both rally periods, I use prior research on the rally effect and Bush’s approval rate data to determine how long Bush’s rally periods lasted. I made the rally effect periods monthly variables because my other variables use monthly averages from my data set. I code the rally effect, honeymoon, divided government, and second term variables to equal one when occurring and zero when not occurring. Controlling for the presence of these variables on Bush’s approval rate allows for a more accurate analysis of the relationships between approval and the three macroeconomic variables and media coverage of Bush. Both rally periods are similar with a large balance of positive news media coverage of Bush during the periods. Also, both rally periods ended in the midst of war with the 9/11 rally occurring during the war in Afghanistan and the Iraq War rally leading to the occupation and counterinsurgency in Iraq. The consequences of these wars for Bush’s popularity are examined below.

War and Bush’s Approval

The public allows the president some latitude in the foreign policy arena with the use of military resources but not without consequence (Peffley, Langley, and Goidel 1995). The War in Afghanistan was popular because its intention was to kill or capture those responsible for the 9/11 terrorist attacks. The Afghan regime (i.e. the Taliban) sheltered the terrorist group Al Qaeda, led by Osama Bin Laden, who orchestrated the 9/11 attacks. The Iraq War was initially popular because of the belief articulated by the Bush Administration that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction (WMDs) armed and ready for deployment against the United States and its allies. They also argued that the Iraq regime was aligned with the same Al Qaeda who orchestrated 9/11 (Gershkoff and Kushner 2005). This war eventually lost popularity because there was little to no evidence of an active WMD program or of ties to Bin Laden’s Al Qaeda (Gelpi, Feaver, and Reifler 2006). As a result, many people believed the Iraq War became a massive waste of resources (Eichenberg 2005). Democrats, Independents, and Republicans differed widely in their support of Bush, with Democrats and Independents opposing the Iraq War and Republicans supporting the war (Fox 2009). This partisan division over the war adversely affected Bush’s approval for the rest of his time in office.

Policy objectives, casualties, and coalition building influence public opinion on all modern American wars including the Iraq War (Eichenberg 2005; Mueller 1999). The Iraq War was expected to be a short war against Iraqi Dictator Saddam Hussein. However, after the regime’s collapse, the war turned into an effort to prevent a civil war. This change in aims helped make the war unpopular because the ending of it became more unclear. According to Eichenberg (2005), American involvement in civil wars is unpopular because civil wars are viewed as too difficult to attain success. Military deaths are another concern for the public, but public sentiment over war deaths are usually tempered by the amount of success in the war (Eichenberg 2005; Gelpi et. al. 2006). U.S. casualties affected Bush’s approval rate as hundreds of troops died every year. Karol and Miguel (2007) found that the number of U.S. war deaths in the Iraq War helped decrease Bush’s margin of victory in the 2004 presidential election. Another setback in public support for the Iraq War was the fact that Americans did not view the Iraqi insurgency as powerful or able to affect our national interests. Research shows that if our enemy is seen as powerful and likely to jeopardize American interests, Americans will tolerate greater casualties (Mueller 1999). Bush helped build an international coalition to help with the Iraq War and that increased popular support for the war (Eichenberg 2005). Most of these reasons show why the Iraq War helped decrease Bush’s approval rate after the Iraq War rally ended.

The media had more negative than positive news about the war which helped decrease Bush’s approval. The preponderance of bad news about the Iraq War had much to do with the lack of progress in the Iraq War, the growing criticism of the war and its handling, and no decrease in the casualty rate for U.S. troops. Stories about U.S. troops dying are negative, stories about countries contributing resources to Bush’s coalition are positive, stories examining the fruitless search for WMDs in Iraq are negative, and stories about elites criticizing Bush’s war policies are negative. (Eichenberg’s 2006). I include elite criticism because Brody’s (1991) research from past wars shows that increasing elite criticism of a war leads to lower presidential approval.

During the 2000s, the Iraq War was the most covered story by the major network news sources CBS, ABC, and NBC (Tyndall Report 2010). The heavy coverage of the Iraq War and greater amount of negative to positive news on Iraq most likely played a significant role in decreasing Bush’s approval because of the media’s strong influence on people. The effect the Iraq War, among the other wars, had on President Bush’s approval rate is incorporated into my news media content analysis of Bush.

The Economy’s Impact on Bush’s Approval

The economy played a significant role in people’s perception of the Bush presidency. At the start of Bush’s presidency in 2001, a recession began in March and did not end until November of that year (NBER 2010). The second recession during his presidency began in December of 2007 and continued after he left office in January of 2009 (NBER 2010). It is apparent that the first recession was not very harmful toward Bush’s approval because the honeymoon period and 9/11 rally both occurred at that time. The rally effects, honeymoon period, and Iraq War likely negated the effect the economy had on Bush’s approval during his first term. From the start of Bush’s second term to the recession in 2007 his approval rate was little affected by the improving economy because of the growing salience of the Iraq War. Since that war was increasingly unpopular, Bush’s approval rate continually decreased. The economy affected Bush’s popularity near the end of his second term when the severe economic recession began. The economy may have been a decisive factor in the decrease in Bush’s popularity in the final year of his second term.

My analysis of Bush’s approval rate uses the macroeconomic indicators of real disposable income, consumer price index, and unemployment rate. They are respectively depicted in graphical form below.

Graph 3: Consumer Price Index, 2001-2009

Graph 4: Unemployment Rate, 2001-2009

These graphs show how these key macroeconomic indicators changed and how the economy performed during the Bush Presidency. Instead of using the absolute numerical values for these macroeconomic variables, I use the monthly percent change for each variable because it is a more accurate measure of how much each variable changed. The macroeconomic indicator’s monthly percent change graphs are displayed below in Graphs 5, 6, and 7.

Graph 5: Monthly Percent Change in Real Disposable Income, 2001-2009

Graph 6: Monthly Percent Change in Consumer Price Index, 2001-2009

Monthly % Change in CPI

Graph 7: Monthly Percent Change in Unemployment Rate, 2001-2009

Monthly % Change in Unemployment

Since much literature argues that it takes longer for the economy to influence approval, I use quarterly data, in addition to monthly data, for the macroeconomic indicators to see if it better predicts approval. The objective is to see if quarterly macroeconomic readings more accurately capture the relationship between the economy and approval than monthly readings. I initially resisted including quarterly data because the other variables are monthly which gives me a larger sample size than quarterly data can give me. If there is no significant difference in accuracy between the monthly and quarterly macroeconomic readings, then monthly readings will be used. I did not include graphs for the quarterly macroeconomic data due to its similarity to the monthly macroeconomic graphs.

Hypotheses on Bush’s Approval Rate

I hypothesize that the media coverage of Bush, the economy through the macroeconomic indicators, the divided government period, the honeymoon period, the rally effect periods, and the second term period affect President Bush’s approval rate by varying degrees. These hypotheses are built off of previous research on approval and from my observations of Bush’s approval rate. I err on the side of my observations of Bush’s approval rate, if a conflict arises between the previous research on presidential approval and the observed changes in Bush’s approval rate,

1) My first hypothesis is that President Bush’s approval rate will increase if positive news coverage of Bush for the month is greater than zero and vice-versa. This hypothesis will not be accepted if Bush’s portrayal in the media does not correspond to Bush’s approval rate or has an inverse relationship with Bush’s approval.

2) My second hypothesis is an insignificant relationship exists between all three of my macroeconomic variables, the CPI, RDI, and unemployment rate, and Bush’s approval rate. Conventional wisdom and previous research says the greater the positive change in the economy, such as the decrease in the unemployment rate, the increase in real disposable income, and the stabilization of the inflation rate, the more likely presidential approval will increase. There is a big reason why my hypothesis goes against the majority of previous research on economic effects on presidential approval. My macroeconomic indicator variables did not change significantly enough to dominate the other variables in affecting Bush’s approval rate until the final year of his presidency when the economy shrunk and dominated the public agenda. The other variables from the rally effect, honeymoon period, second term, divided government, and Bush’s media coverage all affected his approval more often than the economy. These variables muffled the economy’s effect on Bush’s approval by increasing Bush’s approval when the economy was doing poorly and decreasing Bush’s approval when the economy was doing well. This hypothesis will be rejected if I find that any of the macroeconomic indicators significantly influenced Bush’s approval rate.

3) My third hypothesis is that media coverage of Bush has a greater effect on Bush’s approval rate than the macroeconomic indicator variables. For instance, that was the case when the media was overwhelmingly positive about the Bush presidency and approval was very high during the rally periods when the economy was mediocre. When controlling for actual economic conditions, economic news significantly impacts people’s evaluations on how the president is handling the economy (DeBouf and Kellstedt 2004), meaning media coverage of the economy can dwarf other media coverage. During Bush’s presidency, rally periods and wars dwarfed economic news among other types of news (Tyndall Report 2010). When the wars were no longer a major concern for the media, the presidential campaign to replace Bush and a bad economy became the primary concern. This hypothesis ties into the first two hypotheses and relies on the evidence presented in the previous chapter showing the likely relationships between approval and these two variables. I will reject this hypothesis if Bush's media coverage had less of an effect on Bush's approval rate than the economy's effect on Bush’s approval.

4) If my first hypothesis is valid, my fourth hypothesis is the change in media coverage on Bush precedes the change in Bush’s approval rate. As a result, change in media coverage of Bush partly causes the change in his approval rate. This will be found through a Granger causality analysis of the relationship between the variables. I will reject this hypothesis if the conditions for my first hypothesis are rejected or if media coverage of Bush does not Granger-cause change in Bush's approval rate.

5) My fifth hypothesis is that the honeymoon period has a significant affect on Bush’s approval rate. A glance at Bush’s approval rate shows he had a higher average during his honeymoon period (the first seven months of his presidency) than his average approval rate. The balance of previous research shows the honeymoon period significantly affects presidential approval. This hypothesis will be rejected if the honeymoon period does not significantly affect Bush’s approval.

6) My sixth hypothesis is there are strong relationships between the second term and divided government periods and Bush’s approval rate. There is little previous research done on the second term’s and divided government’s effect on presidential approval. However, research shows that most presidencies have a lower approval rate in the second term when compared to the first term. I observed Bush’s approval and noticed it decreased during most of his presidency. When these two periods occur they are likely to be associated with decreasing approval rate for Bush when controlling for the other variables. This hypothesis will be rejected if these variables do not significantly influence Bush’s approval rate.

The Analysis of Bush’s Media Coverage

Media coverage of Bush should affect his approval rate. If the daily balance of news equals out to zero, then approval is unlikely to change; but if it is positive or negative, then approval should respectively increase or decrease. This is supported by Brody and Page (1975, 143) and Brody (1991), who point out that a daily balance of bad over good news influences people to disapprove of the president and vice-versa. Operationalizing media news content into a variable, when done right, shows that the news media influence public opinion of the president. Presidential approval is the best general indicator of public opinion towards the president and can indicate whether news media coverage of the Bush presidency is trending positively or negatively. The amount of news coverage for a given event and whether it is positive, neutral, or negative towards Bush is what matters most when finding how presidential approval will change from media coverage.

Fan’s (1988) and Brody’s analyses (1991) help justify doing a media content analysis to determine the media influence over the change in Bush’s approval rate. By finding out how each story relates to Bush, I am able to score it in my scale. There are several approaches to take when measuring media influence on the American citizen. The U.S. media are difficult to analyze because of their size and diversity that produces media outlets whose focus is on various agendas (Woolley 2000) as a result of narrow-casting.

The best way to find the media’s effect on people is to know what stories the media are covering to set the agenda. A story’s impact varies due to its cumulative frequency, recency, and the evaluative tone (Althaus and Kim 2006). Finding out how much time, pages, or lines are devoted to a story and whether a story is covered multiple times (cumulative frequency), running for days or weeks signals a story’s importance (Brody 1991: 110). This study weighs all stories equally because most were top stories. Some studies, like Fan’s (1988, 58, 67), attach different weights to stories depending on how strong that story sides with different perspectives. Fan (123) points out that having different weights to the stories produce negligible results, meaning my exclusion of weights should make little difference to the accuracy of the content analysis. The recency of a story means that the more recent a story, the more influential it is on people and vice-versa. People usually forget a news story shortly after hearing it, and Fan (1988) calls this the law of the 24 hour day. A typical story only has a half life of one day (Fan 67), meaning the story’s effect is half of what it was initially. However, this depends on the type of story. If the story is to never be repeated again, then the law of the 24 hour day will hold for that story. If it is a reoccurring story, it will have a greater impact.

As I have pointed out, when a story is emphasized for a longer period of time, it becomes salient to people. This is why I specifically target the stories repeated throughout the day and top stories. A repetitive media help people focus on what the media is covering. At times a major story can dominate news, like the Iraq War did for much of the past decade. But usually there are not many mainstay stories or ongoing events to keep the media’s attention, and they determine daily what is on the agenda (Brody 1991: 113). Media coverage has an inertial component where stories tend to stay negative or positive (160). This is likely due to certain topics dominating the media agenda like war, crisis, etc. The inertial component inadvertently increases agenda-setting and priming. Nevertheless, what the media report on usually changes from president to president (113).

A scale to determine how the media influence people is needed. Some research uses more complex scales to determine the emphasis of a story and its strength. For instance, Fan (1988, 14) used a five point scale and counted lines and paragraphs that were either characterized as “for”, “against”, or “neutral” on the topic that the story is covering. Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson (2002) illustrated how a computer key word search expedites the coding process and shows whether a president is in control (i.e. doing good) or not in control (i.e. not doing good).

I opted to manually code each story’s content because the presidency is a multifaceted and complex institution. Manual coding can be as accurate as advanced computer textual analysis. An advanced computer textual analysis program would be necessary to do this because of the changing context of the words and phrases when dealing with the president and things associated with the president. The computer determines how the story influences people’s opinions by analyzing words, phrases, sentences, and paragraphs in every article to show how the article is influencing opinion. The researcher sets the parameters for the program so it knows what to look for. Advanced computer textual analysis\textsuperscript{14} saves time, if you are adept at using it, because the computer program does the work. I did not use an advanced textual analysis program because it would take too much time to learn it and too much money to buy it (Audience Dialogue 2007). Its advantages are greater uniformity and less mistakes, its disadvantages are the long amount of time it takes to master and the large amount of money it costs. An advanced computer textual analysis program would be worthwhile to try if I was covering a significantly longer time period.

I read the articles and decided their overall content based on the whole article and not on the headline or a few words. I focused exclusively on how each story concerned the Bush Presidency. I performed a content analysis targeting the top national news. A content analysis is a, “... systematic, objective, quantitative analysis of message characteristics. (Neuendorf 1)” The content being analyzed is major print, broadcast, and internet news in the United States. I examined the whole story to see if the words and sentences negatively or positively portray the president, his administration, and his policies and then score it 1, 0, or -1.\textsuperscript{15} 1 or one means the story covers the presidency in some way and gives a positive outcome for the Bush presidency. -1 or negative one means the story covers the presidency in some way and gives a negative outcome for the Bush Presidency. 0 or zero means the story is neutral towards Bush because it was not about him or it was neither a positive or negative \textsuperscript{14} There is a big difference between an advanced textual analysis program and an average one. It is the difference between having a poor or decent measure of media content on the Bush Presidency. The advanced programs can decipher far more text while also thinking of the prior text that it analyzed to discover patterns within the coverage of events. The average textual analysis programs are incapable of doing that and, at best, focus on one story at a time (Audience Dialogue 2007).

\textsuperscript{15} A sample coding form is in Appendix D. A primary feature of it is its simplicity. I did that because my aim was to evaluate how the story reflected upon the President. If I made it more complex it would explain where the good, neutral, and bad news comes from. For instance, if I had classified each story as economic, foreign affairs, etc. then we could know the balance of good and bad news from economic, foreign affairs, etc.
outcome for him. These numbers are explained more in depth later in this chapter and in Appendix B. This type of content analysis can be replicated on most news sources for any time period with accurate records.

For each day throughout the Bush presidency, I subtract positive from negative news stories to determine the overall balance of positive or negative coverage of Bush on a daily basis. Each day can be different with some days having very negative or positive coverage of Bush. However, I limit how much one day can affect one’s evaluations of the president because this study is concerned with long-term changes in public opinion. Each day can equal at most 2 or -2, meaning only two positive or two negative stories can be counted at most per day. When studying sustained public opinion change, long-term changes in media coverage are far more important than one day of very bad or good news. One day of news should never have as great of an effect as two or more days of news. Fan’s (1988) law of the 24 hour day supports this limit to daily media influence. Fan (1988, 5) elaborates, “This law simply acknowledges that the public is constantly being bombarded by new information, with so much being available that a person can only reflect carefully on a small fraction. As a result, most information is taken at face value.” This is also why I try to analyze as many top stories on a daily basis as possible because most people do not know all of the top news stories. I also combine stories dealing with the same issue into one score. For instance, when two stories deal with the Iraq War and they are negative, I count them as one negative story. The frequency of a story or similar stories in a single day is not important when measuring long-term opinion change because long-term opinion change occurs over several days. If short-term opinion change was analyzed, every story would be counted individually.\textsuperscript{16}

Cable Network News (CNN) broadcasts and Associated Press (AP) wire dispatches are used for my content analysis.\textsuperscript{17} AP and CNN are established, respected, trusted, and viewed by most Americans. AP wire dispatches are used by several major news organizations including CNN who just recently stopped using AP in favor of in-house news gathering (Fitzgerald 2010). The AP disseminates news to all types of media organizations regardless of whether they are on TV, print, or internet (Fan 28).
CNN has a large broadcast audience and online audience with CNN.com that reaches 20 million unique visitors per month (Prior 2007, 2). According to the Pew Organization (2009), CNN is viewed favorably by 60 percent of Americans with a majority of Republicans and Democrats viewing it favorably.

I acquired CNN and AP transcripts from the Lexis Nexis Academic Universe for the dates of January 19\textsuperscript{th} 2001 to January 20\textsuperscript{th} 2009. There are two advantages to using video footage of news broadcasts for my content analysis. First, most people watch news on TV (Pew 2009). Second, this audience gets nonverbal messages that I cannot measure from transcripts. The Vanderbilt Television News Archive is probably the best available visual source to use when doing a television news content analysis.
Unfortunately, it covers a smaller amount of news content (Fan 28), costs money, and is time consuming to watch.

During the news media content collection process, I searched every day for transcripts. The search term I used for AP were “associated press”, “domestic”, and \textsuperscript{16} I point out in the conclusion how analyzing short-term approval change can improve approval research.

\textsuperscript{17} A summary of every day from that time period with its coding evaluation score is in Appendix C.
“news” and for CNN it is “cnn”.\textsuperscript{18} The search terms are broad because I want to draw out all U.S. news to get an unbiased look at what the average American encounters when reading or seeing the news. There were also different categories of content. I searched in the television and radio broadcast transcripts category for CNN and the news wire services category for AP. I tried to use CNN for the entire content analysis until I realized how few CNN transcripts were available until the years 2006-2009. I decided to use AP for the earlier years. When analyzing AP transcripts, I normally targeted stories that were top stories or repeated stories. For CNN broadcasts, I analyzed the stories at or near the beginning of its broadcast and repeated stories. These top stories are ones most likely to be remembered by people watching or reading the news (Iyengar and Kinder 1987). Once I found the news stories for that day, I downloaded their transcripts and organized them into a hard drive file before analyzing their content.

As a rule, if a story is covered by CNN or AP it is likely to be covered in many other news outlets. This is especially true for AP since I found a large number of stories on a daily basis, but not as true with CNN due to a lack of stories on certain days. Sometimes I could only find one major story from the CNN broadcast, whereas one day I found 19 top news stories from the AP. For the most part, my media coverage of Bush rating is very detailed and able to show how Bush is covered in the media with an average of 5.48 stories per day. My content analysis has a daily average of 3.18 stories from CNN and a daily average of 7.34 stories from AP. With a great variety of news in today’s world, it makes sense to focus on a broad range of news because people usually see snippets of news and are less likely to see the main story of the day. This occurs because of narrow-casting and the fragmentation of the media audience. Increasing the amount of news in the content analysis helps ameliorate the problem of people who are unaware of certain top stories.

Statistical Concerns for the News Media Content Rating Variable

One concern is whether these organizations are covering the same news and similarly reporting it. As I pointed out, CNN has fewer stories per day than AP. It can be argued that AP is more accurate because it has a higher number of top stories per day. Any difference between the two is a concern for this research because I am using these organizations to measure the same thing, Bush’s media coverage. Aforementioned in the earlier section are reasons why this should not be a concern, such as CNN sometimes using AP wire dispatches for its news and my ability to gather a wide swath of AP stories per day.

A difference of means statistical test can measure the differences in media coverage on Bush from both organizations. In Appendix E is a Welch’s T-test I ran using R.\(^\text{19}\) Compared to the Student’s t-test, the Welch’s t-test has the advantage of being able to test data sets with different variances, whereas the variances must be the same for the Student's t-test. The Welch’s t-test shows that the differences between the two organizations are insignificant. The p-values are too small to warrant concern over differences between CNN and AP. I used each organization’s news transcripts for a roughly equal number of days, with the AP having 55 percent of the days and CNN having the remainder. Below, Graph 8 shows the changes in Bush’s media coverage for CNN and AP. Take note that CNN dominates the more recent years in this graph and AP dominates the earlier years. This graph shows little difference between the two news organizations.

Graph 8: Bush’s Media Coverage Rating from AP and CNN

When doing a content analysis, one rule of coding is to consistently apply the same rules to all news stories. Consistency and unity are necessary for the creation of any meaningful variable. This was why I hired a coder to audit my coding. He followed my coding scheme and worked on it the same way I did by manually going through the same top stories of the day for every day out of the year during the Bush presidency.\(^\text{20}\)

We made sure to take our time coding to avoid coder fatigue and mistakes. I also did not tell him the overall purpose of the study until we finished the coding process. I did this to avoid any potential personal bias of his from influencing his auditing. I also took time to meet with him several times to explain and supervise his auditing of my coding.

Covariance is the determination of how much our coding of the news stories matches (Neuendorf 144). There was little disagreement between us and few mistakes in the content analysis of the news; thus, expediting the process. Our rate of intercoder disagreement, the percentage of times we disagreed, for the whole series was 298 stories out of 16,011 total stories. This is 1.9 percent disagreement rate. Once my auditor finished a few years, we reevaluated the stories we disagreed on. Out of those 298 stories, 86 did not need to be changed. Most of the time the auditor’s judgment of the story’s content was correct. I believe this happened because my auditor was astute in his observations, and I may have suffered from some coder fatigue. There were some stories that were difficult to judge because they were close to being positive or negative stories instead of neutral stories of Bush. Only 212 stories out of 16,011 total stories had to be changed, giving us a final disagreement rate of 1.3 percent. Good research demands a low disagreement rate. When it is below ten percent, it is acceptable to researchers in the field of content analysis (143).

Another aspect that must be controlled is chance agreement between the auditor and I. Cohen’s Kappa is a statistical test for chance agreement and should provide a reliable measure of intercoder reliability.\(^{21}\) After computing the test, I get a Kappa of .59 meaning there is a moderate to good relationship between our coding of the news stories. This is somewhat low considering we did not disagree on many news stories. Apparently chance played a significant role in our agreement and that is why the percent disagreement is so low and the Kappa is moderate. This is not enough to affect the accuracy of the content analysis. I believe the percentage agreement/disagreement and Kappa score show a largely accurate content analysis of Bush’s media coverage.

Criteria for the Coding of the Presidency in the Media

When reading news stories the primary objective was to see how they relate to the Bush Presidency. Most news coverage has no content concerning the president, the executive branch, or anything linked to the president. The categories of news not involving Bush include religious movements, man-made disasters/accidents, human interest news, sporting/athletic events, and entertainment/pop culture events. Of the stories that covered Bush to some degree, some had a singular focus on him and his presidency, while others dealt with the presidency on the periphery of its main topic. There are a number of themes in the news that help simplify the process of coding.

Most stories dealing with the presidency can be classified as valance issues, policy proposals, policy results/implementation, elite criticism, elite praise, media speculation, and action from the speculated event. There are many different types of news concerning President Bush that fall under these broad categories. For instance, when it is a natural disaster that involves Bush, the story will be positive, negative, or neutral because of the respective success, failure, or lack of either by the agencies under Bush’s control dealing with the disaster. This also happens when the presidency has good, bad, or neutral policy results in science, technology, military, social, welfare, education policy, et cetera. Presidential appointments, policy creation, and policy implementation lead to policy results and normally involve the president. When the president gets what he wants from appointments, policy creation, and policy implementation, it is considered positive for Bush’s media coverage rating and vice-versa. Policy speeches and proposals are neutral unless the president is criticized and/or looks bad. Elite criticism and praise of the presidency can respectively decrease and increase Bush’s media coverage rating. Polling and election results, when clearly for or against President Bush and/or something closely related to him respectively increases or decreases Bush’s media coverage rating. Policy speculation and action stories deal respectively with potential results and actual results. A political scandal is a good example of a speculative story that may deal with the presidency. As the story becomes more developed and known the story may turn into a results story that is negative, neutral, or positive for Bush’s media coverage rating.

Valance issues are outcomes that people of all moderate partisan orientations either desire or want to avoid for the country’s sake. Economic prosperity is a valence issue that people desire, and they hold the president responsible for taking action that brings economic prosperity. Even if economic prosperity is not the result of something the president did, people give him credit for the result regardless. When the news cover the U.S. economy growing or declining, presidential approval respectively increases or decreases (Brody and Page 1975). Another valence issue is foreign policy, and more specifically, war and peace between American and other countries in the world. Earlier in this chapter, I pointed out that the Iraq War’s outcome can be considered a valence issue. So when there is bad news on the war-front, it is bad for the president, and people blame the president and vice-versa.

Presidents publicly propose and support policies that usually go with their partisan orientations. Brody’s (1991, 164) research shows that changes in the amount of policy proposals are not associated with presidential approval change from the Kennedy Administration to the Reagan Administration. When the president speaks in favor or against a policy proposal, it tends to strengthen his partisan base and weaken his standing with followers of the opposition. Since aggregate partisanship in America is roughly balanced, the president will not lose or gain any approval when advocating a policy (Brody 1991, 119; Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 65). Another reason why Bush’s policy proposals have no effect on his approval rate is due to a lack of results from his proposals. Sometimes Bush looked bad because he misstated facts, and this type of story was counted as negative because he looked incompetent. Usually when there are only words from Bush, it is a neutral story for his media coverage rating. If a policy Bush supports becomes law or has momentum toward passage into law, it is a positive news story for Bush’s media coverage rating. It is positive because it is consistent with the president’s legislative/policy goals and results in an action being either passage into law or a clear momentum toward passage. Also, the president appears effective to all partisan orientations, and they are all likelier to approve of his job as president. On the other hand, if a bill that Bush supports is defeated or one that Bush opposes passes, it is negative news for Bush because it is a result that is opposite to what Bush wants (Brody 1991). Brody (121) points out that policy results associated with the president have a much greater impact on public opinion because elite (i.e. media elites) opinion leadership of policy results is more muted than their opinion leadership on policy proposals.

A president appearing successful is more popular with people and vice-versa. People watch the news media to keep score over the president’s successes and failures. People are more likely have negative feelings for an ineffective president and positive feelings for an effective president (Popkin et. al. 1976). An effective president is one who gets what he wants through Congress, the court system, and powers of his office, whereas an ineffective president is one who does not get what he wants (Brody 120-121; Ostrom and Simon 1985). When the outcome is unclear for a policy result, it results in a neutral story for the president. One instance of a positive policy result story for Bush’s media coverage rating is when he signed his No Child Left Behind Education Bill that occurred on January 8th 2002. 22 A negative story for Bush occurred July 18th 2006, when the Senate approved a stem cell bill that Bush vowed to veto. These are common examples of how the stories are analyzed and measured for Bush’s media coverage rating.

Elite commentary plays a pivotal role in the analysis of news stories. Elites are often in the news and have credibility with people based on their status. They sometimes criticized and praised the Bush Administration. Stories with elite praise or blame elicit respectively a positive or negative score for Bush’s media coverage rating. An example of elite praise occurred after 9/11 when politicians praised Bush’s actions against terrorism. An example of elite criticism occurred when Republicans criticized Bush’s Immigration Reform Bill in 2006. Another type of news that is negative for Bush is corruption and scandal stories that implicate the Bush Administration. However, scandals with little to no relationship to the Bush Administration but implicate a Republican are neutral stories for Bush. Polling stories are now newsworthy and abundant because of their growth and popularity. These stories usually run during election seasons, but are now regularly covered throughout a typical presidency.

22 In Appendix C is my coding chart with all of the stories, dates, and scores for each story.
especially when presidential approval moves significantly. Polling stories showing Bush, or something or someone closely associated with him, gaining popularity or having high popularity is positive media coverage for Bush and vice-versa. Speculation stories are similar to the aforementioned policy proposal stories and are considered neutral for Bush’s media coverage rating. When speculation ends as a result in the news, it is analyzed to see if Bush appears positive, negative or neutral from that story. Further criteria for my coding scheme are in my coding table in Appendix B.

Now I can tabulate the daily numbers for Bush’s media coverage rate. I use daily data to make a monthly moving average to see how Bush’s media coverage influences Bush’s monthly approval rate. The media variable is limited to a month because people forget news stories and events after almost a month, it takes almost a month to measure long-term opinion change, and the macroeconomic data is monthly. Instead of using a monthly percentage of good versus bad news, a monthly moving average of good and bad news is used because it more accurately measures the same thing and does not focus on neutral stories.\(^{23}\) Bush had more negative than positive news coverage during his eight years as president. Below is a graph of the exponential monthly moving average of Bush’s media coverage rating variable. In Bush’s first term, he had an average daily news media coverage rating of -0.066, giving him significantly \(^{23}\) Brody’s (1991) approach to measuring news story content was to have a percentage of good and bad news for the president. Unfortunately I could not do a percentage measure of good and bad news because there were so many more stories in my measure, on average, than Brody’s with neutral stories dominating the measure. This makes the percentage of negative and positive stories not as meaningful. Also the law of the 24 hour news cycle daily limitation on the number of positive stories and negative stories to 2 and -2 would not give a true measure of the percentage of positive and negative stories since some days had large numbers of positive or negative stories. I am confident, for purposes of manipulating the statistical data, that an absolute count with limits of 2 and -2 will more easily average out and will work just as well or better with other data.

more positive media coverage when compared to his second term daily average of -0.48. A close examination shows that Graph 9 is somewhat similar to Graph 1, Bush’s Approval Rate.

Graph 9: Bush’s Media Coverage Rating Moving Average

There are plenty of reasons for why the second term was more negative in terms of media coverage. First, Bush had no more rally effects after the Iraq War rally. Second, he orchestrated a divisive and ultimately unpopular war. Third, the economic collapse in 2007 to the end of his term made media coverage much more negative for economic events than before the collapse. The fourth factor contributing to the decline in positive media coverage was the 2008 Presidential Election and its long campaign season that resulted in many publicized criticisms of Bush from Democrat and Republican candidates. The fifth factor is the 2006 Congressional Elections and resulting divided government that contributed to greater negative coverage of Bush due to increasing prominence of Democrat lawmakers opposing and criticizing Bush. Sixth, the large amount of poll stories on the presidency (Atkin and Gaudino 1984) and President Bush's growing unpopularity increased negative media coverage of Bush. Below, Graph 10 shows Bush's approval rate and Bush's media coverage rating superimposed to illustrate their similarity.

In this chapter, I show and explain how each variable behaved during the Bush Presidency using data, observation, and previous research on the variables and their relationships. One way I did this was by graphing my variable's data to show how they behaved and that was similar to other research. Second, I began to operationalize the variables. Third, I proposed some hypotheses from my observations of data and previous research. Fourth, I explained my operationalization of Bush’s media coverage rating variable and how I generated Bush’s media coverage rating scale for stories relating to President Bush. Fifth, I explained the logic behind my story classification system in my content analysis. Lastly, I graphed my Bush’s media coverage rating variable and compared it to the behavior of the other variables. As a result of these actions, I have a good understanding of the variables and their characteristics to pursue more advanced statistical methods in order to explore their relationships with each other. In the next chapter, I will give a complete elaboration of the statistical methods I undertake to study these variables and their relationships. I will show what needs to be scrutinized in order to properly apply these methods.

METHODOLOGY

Prior to this chapter, I focused mostly on theoretical issues and qualitative aspects of my variables and their relationships with each other. Now the focus is on quantitative aspects of my variables and their relationships. In the last two chapters, I studied research to produce valid hypotheses and theoretically justify my arrangement of variables. I start this chapter off by identifying and refuting potential problems with the public opinion polling for my study such as presidential approval. Then I point out some potential problems with my data. The testing procedures necessary to detect any potential problems are explained, such as autocorrelation, multicollinearity, and heteroskedasticity. I justify my use of certain statistical tests that show whether my predictions about the variable’s relationships are likely or not likely to occur. Then I explain the tests used to analyze the relationships between the variables.

Potential Problems with My Public Opinion Research

There are a few criticisms of public opinion polling that need to be explained and refuted for the purposes of this study. One criticism of public opinion that might affect this study is the lack of political knowledge among the aggregate population. If no one knew whether they approve or disapprove of the president, then the aggregate results from that question would have no merit when analyzing the president’s approval rate. However, it is not necessary to have high levels of political knowledge to know whether you approve or disapprove of the president. Lacking political knowledge is not a problem for presidential approval research, since a large majority of people know whether they approve or disapprove of the president.
Positivity bias can occur when there is a lack of political knowledge. It occurs when a survey respondent gives a positive evaluation when he or she lacks the political knowledge necessary to make a proper evaluation (Edwards and Gallup 123). Positivity bias has its strongest impact during the honeymoon period when people know little of the new president. During the honeymoon period the president has higher approval than the rest of his term. Positivity bias can occur during a foreign policy crisis where there is little information about the foreign policy crisis and what is known is given to us by the president. This crisis can help produce a rally effect for presidential approval because people know little about it (Brody 1991). Presidential approval can be affected by positivity bias during honeymoon periods and rally periods.

The Data

My measure of Bush’s approval rate is very accurate because iPoll uses so many different survey organizations. Survey organizations on their own produce a consistent bias in their approval rates. For instance, Zogby and Fox have respectively lower and higher approval rates, on average, when compared to the average approval rate at any given time. The iPoll approval rate because it is averaged out from all of organizations I listed in chapter three, is more accurate and less biased (Chung 2007).

This time series analysis approximates approval by forecasting it. Projected approval will not be as the same as real approval, but will be close enough to accurately predict the president’s approval rate. This study has strong internal validity because it has all of the variables most likely to affect Bush’s approval rate.\footnote{As I pointed out in the last chapter, I include an inertial component being a one month lagged approval variable to make sure I measure what moves approval. The month lag in approval shows that most people who either approve or do not approve of the president do not change their opinion within a month. Then my other variables are able to predict the month to month changes in presidential approval.} Since I am doing a time series analysis, I use time series methods to study the relationships between my independent variables and approval. With my continuous time series data set it should be appropriate to use ordinary least squares (OLS) regression. OLS has a few other conditions for the data to follow that will be explained further along in this chapter. OLS is prominent in regression analysis and commonly used by researchers to find a relationship between independent and dependent variables.

Presidential approval is affected by events, but as time passes their impact fades away and approval returns to its mean. I use my control variables, rally period, honeymoon period, divided government period, and second term period, as dummy variables to control for their effects on the approval rate. I do not use a decay mechanism for these variables where its impact fades as time passes. I do this to capture its effect on presidential approval and without assuming a rate of decay (Baum 2002a).

Time series models operate under the assumption that observations near each other in time are more closely related than observations further apart. As a result, approval rates nearer in time to the current approval rate have a stronger effect on the approval rate and vice-versa. Since recent events matter more than distant events, approval is not integrated. If approval was integrated, distant events would have the same impact as when they first occurred. Other presidencies’ approval rates are normally stationary and not integrated (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 34-35).

Usually, the approval rate is a first order autoregressive data set signified by AR(1). This means that current approval is highly correlated with past approval, but as time increases this correlation decreases. The AR(1) equation, $y_t = \Phi y_{t-n} + \varepsilon_t$, shows as the lag increases, the amount of correlation between present approval \((t)\) and past \((t-n)\) approval decreases. The symbols in this equation stand for: \(\varepsilon\) = the amount of error, \(\Phi\) = the coefficient, \(n\) = the number of months, and \(y\) = approval. As the lag increases between current and past approval, the correlation makes its way to zero.\(^{26}\) The president’s approval rate from a year ago is a poor predictor when trying to predict the current approval rate. An example of this occurred in early 1991 when President Bush’s approval rate hovered in the high 80s percentile and fell to the 30s percentile a year later (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002, 34-35). Approval on average moves in a curvilinear direction when the Johnson through the Clinton presidencies are compared. The average monthly change in presidential approval is a decline of a .29 percent which means a decrease of 15 percent over a four year term.

I use a unit root test, called an Augmented Dickey-Fuller (ADF) test, to find out whether all of my variables are stationary around their mean. In essence, I want to find out if there are any underlying trends that keep the data further away from their mean. An ADF test measures how much a variable revolves around its mean in a time series data-set. The results of this test are important because they determine what statistical tests can be used. By testing to see if \(\beta\) is significantly different from zero, we will see whether Bush’s approval is a stationary or integrated time series. I find that Bush’s approval rate has between a one and five percent critical value, meaning it is stationary around its mean.\(^{27}\) The approval rate usually decreases little when it goes below its mean and vice-versa. Interestingly, Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo (2006) found Bush’s approval rate to be nonstationary. The difference between their data and mine is attributable to the fact that I am using approval data for all of Bush’s term and using a broader set of approval polls from several organizations.

\(^{26}\) A graph of Bush’s current approval and its correlation with differing lags in approval is in Appendix A.
\(^{27}\) The results of the Augmented Dickey-Fuller Test are in Appendix F.

I tested the other variables to see if they are stationary around their means. Bush’s media coverage variable has less than a one percent critical value making it stationary around the mean. The percent change in the consumer price index ($\Delta CPI$) variable has less than a one percent critical value making it stationary around the mean. The percent change in unemployment ($\Delta U$) has less than a one percent critical value, making it stationary around the mean. The percent change in real disposable income ($\Delta RDI$) has much less than a one percent critical value, making it stationary around the mean. Every variable has a unit root and their data-sets are all stationary around their means. Stationary time series data help avoid spurious relationships from my regression analysis because they are less likely to follow spurious trends (Clark and Stewart 1994). This also means these variables do not require as complicated statistical tests. The relationship between these variables can be seen with an autoregressive moving average (ARMA).

There are also possible problems with my data-set such as autocorrelation, multicollinearity, and heteroskedasticity. I perform diagnostic tests for each of these problems to see if my data is compatible with OLS. Heteroskedasticity occurs when predicted error terms for the data, known as residuals, are dispersed far from their actual error terms and change unpredictably. For OLS regression, one assumption is that residuals are not random; thus, they are not dispersed or unpredictable. If my variables have residuals that are heteroskedastic, I will not be able to use OLS. Homoskedasticity is the opposite of this problem and is what I need to use OLS. One step when examining the data for heteroskedasticity is to examine the residuals that are located in Appendix K.

The residuals for the monthly data are computed from the regression of my variables. The residuals in graphical form show how far each prediction is away from the actual data – signified by the red line. The further the predicted error is away from the actual error, the less the variables are able to predict the dependent variable. In short, my residuals need to be small in order for me to use my variables to predict Bush’s approval rate. If the residuals are small enough, the validity of my whole model for presidential approval is still good and reliable. One observation, September 2001, was out of place with a predicted residual being far from the actual residual. This was probably due to the September 11th attack’s large rally effect on approval. The immediate and large change in approval for that month makes it an outlier. Even though it is barely within the limits for what is acceptable, I will change it into a dummy variable for that month. This is done to not allow that month to influence the rest of my data. A close look at the other residuals shows that they are homoskedastic because their variance is constant across the 97 observations. So overall there is little to worry about from heteroskedasticity.

Another potential concern is multicollinearity. This occurs when two or more independent variables are highly correlated with each other. First, I use a correlational analysis to detect the correlations between all of the variables. This analysis gives a preliminary glimpse of what variables are correlated together. Any time there is a high correlation between the independent variables, it influences the overall model because their relationship to the dependent variable (presidential approval rate) will be different than what it is supposed to be theoretically. When independent variables correlate with each other, they occur at different times, and help cause the other independent variables. This influences their relationships with the other variables and the overall causal model. Multicollinearity does not reduce the predictive power of the model but does unpredictably affect the independent variables. The coefficient estimates for the independent variables will change unpredictably with small changes in the model or data. Multicollinearity also increases standard errors for the independent variables affected by it.

It is apparent from the correlation table in Appendix H that there are many variables that have a significant correlation to Bush's approval rate. I found a significant correlation between Bush's media coverage and the rally effect period, Bush’s media coverage and second term period, and divided government period and second term period. First, it is unsurprising that there would be a correlation between Bush's media coverage and the rally effect period because the news coverage during that period is overwhelmingly positive, and the same relationship is true for negative news during the second term. Also unsurprising is the correlation between the divided government period and the second term period because they occur at the same time when Bush's approval rate is decreasing. My concern is whether one causes the other or whether these correlations are incidental and unable to sabotage the variable's relationships. A variance inflation factor (VIF) is a useful test able to detect and quantify multicollinearity for an OLS regression. The VIF gives an index showing how much the variance of a variable’s estimated regression coefficient changes from multicollinearity. If it is a problem, multicollinearity can be ameliorated by increasing the sample size (even though my sample is large for this study) and excluding the problem variable. After computing the variable's VIFs\(^{28}\) no single variable appears to suffer from multicollinearity. Lagged approval, Bush’s media coverage, rally effect, second term, and divided government are strongly correlated to approval and predictably have large VIFs. The second term is near the border of what is acceptable for a VIF, but since it did not cross the threshold of 5 or more, I will keep it in the model.

Autocorrelation occurs when residuals correlate with other residuals in a variable at certain points in time. Autocorrelation has correlated errors that affect the usefulness of OLS because the residuals of the data are not supposed to be correlated. Autocorrelation of the residuals tends to underestimate the standard errors and overestimate the t-scores (parameter type statistics). This can affect the significance of the relationships by making some more or less significant. As a result, autocorrelation can make this study’s results inaccurate, if it exists. This becomes a problem when using time series data because the data are chronologically organized, meaning the residuals that occur when predicting approval at one point in time may be correlated to the residuals produced when predicting approval at other points in time. Therefore, the use of time series data makes it more important to test and limit the effects of autocorrelation. The best way to identify the presence of autocorrelation in my data is to run a Breusch-Godfrey test. This test is necessary because it can handle the lagged approval independent variable and the autocorrelation of higher orders. This test confirms that autocorrelation is not a problem because the LM test score is less than

the p-value.29

The Tests

The sample size is the 97 months (eight years) of the Bush Presidency. I calculated the descriptive statistics30 for the variables using STATA 11.31 However, a close look at the descriptive statistics reveals little about the relationships among the variables. Now I focus on what tests I am using to examine the relationships of my variables and why I use these tests.

My main mode of analyzing these variables is OLS regression. The reason I chose to use OLS is that I have experience using it and it is well understood by researchers. There are a number of other tests that presidential approval scholars utilize such as vector autoregression (VAR), vector error correction (VEC), and the Cochrane-Orcutt estimator. Since my data follow the requirements of OLS by being stationary around a mean, having a normal distribution, having residuals that are homoskedastic, having residuals that are stationary around a mean, having no multicollinearity, having full continuity in the data-sets, and having no autocorrelation, it is suitable for OLS.

OLS regression will analyze the variable’s data together through multiple regression. My data will yield their standard errors and show how accurate my variables can be as predictors for Bush’s approval. OLS shows the relationship between my variables and Bush’s approval from each of their coefficients. OLS has been and still is used in a number of other studies\footnote{(Brody and Page 1975; Page, Dempsey, and Shapiro 1987; Brody 1991; Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo 2006; Week 8: Time Series, Keele 2010)} that analyze presidential approval and is widely used in the social sciences. Once I finish with the OLS results, I will run a robust regression. Robust regression supplements the OLS coefficients by producing more accurate coefficients. Robust regression works by giving varying weights to each variable based on each variable’s residuals. This is done after a number of regression simulations on the data to establish the proper weights for the variables to produce the most accurate results. These weights limit the amount of error the residuals may have for each variable and as a result lower their own error terms. Robust regression has the opportunity to make my model of approval change even more accurate.

In more recent years many approval researchers moved away from strictly OLS and robust regression to favor error correction models among other statistical tools.\footnote{Robust regression is technically an error correction regression because it applies weights to the variables, their error terms, and residuals.} I use one of these popular tools, the Granger causality test, to add more validity and explanatory power to my model. The Granger causality test determines the direction of causality between the dependent and independent variables. This test has grown in popularity for time series analysis and is now used in many studies.\footnote{(MacKuen, Erikson, and Stimson 1992; Wood and Peake 1998; Edwards and Wood 1999; McAvoy 2006; Jacobson 2010)}

The test is somewhat simple; however, the theory behind this procedure is complex. To find out if any of my independent variables cause change in Bush's approval rate, the Granger test requires regressing each one of them on their own lagged values and on the lagged values of Bush's approval rate. The test can use several lags to establish a causal ordering, where the test can establish that one variable changed prior to the change in the other variable. Part of the Granger test is a standard partial F-test. The F-test is used by the Granger test to see whether the coefficients associated with Bush’s media coverage variable are zero. This will show if Bush’s media coverage variable happened before the change in his approval rate. If this occurs, Bush’s media coverage variable can cause changes in Bush’s approval rate. The same goes for the macroeconomic variables. The Granger test is redundant in the sense that it also tests to see if Bush’s approval rate causes changes in Bush’s media coverage variable. However, this test is not the final statement on causality. Having good data, a strong theoretical model, and strong relationships among the variables are more important than the Granger causality test by itself. Without those parts, the Granger test is of little value and meaning.

Looking Forward

In this chapter, I explored the methodological difficulties with this type of research design, analyzed the properties of the data, performed diagnostics on the variables, and explained the rationale for the statistical tests that will answer the questions and concerns of this study. Analyzing the variables’ data is a crucial process that is necessary to use the proper test to produce accurate and interpretable results. The diagnostic tests did not detect autocorrelation, multicollinearity, and heteroskedasticity. I picked statistical tests that I have experience using and are compatible with my variables’ data-sets. The statistical tests will give me answers for my predictions and be able to create a close fitting model of Bush’s predicted approval rate.

My plan is to first perform the OLS test and then the robust regression. Then I will analyze my variable’s coefficients, their standard errors, and the characteristics of the overall fit of the model like $R^2$ and the residual standard error. The equation for Bush’s approval rate is:

$$\text{Approve}_t = \beta_0 + \beta_1 \text{Approve}_{t-1} + \beta_2 \text{Bush’s media coverage} + \beta_3 \%\Delta \text{CPI}_t + \beta_4 \%\Delta \text{RDI}_t + \beta_5 \%\Delta \text{U}_t + \beta_6 \text{Rally effect}_t + \beta_7 \text{Honeymoon}_t + \beta_8 \text{Second term}_t + \beta_9 \text{Divided government}_t + \beta_{10} \text{September 11}^{th} + \epsilon_t$$

where $\beta_0 =$ constant; $\text{Approve} = \text{Bush’s approval rate}$; $\text{Bush’s media coverage} = \text{Bush’s news media coverage rating}$; $\%\Delta \text{CPI} =$ monthly percent change in consumer price index; $\%\Delta \text{RDI} =$ monthly percent change in real disposable income; $\%\Delta \text{U} =$ monthly percent change in the unemployment rate; Rally effect = dummy variable indicating the presence of a rally period; Honeymoon = dummy variable indicating the presence of the honeymoon period; Second term = dummy variable indicating the presence of the second term; Divided government = dummy variable indicating the presence of divided government; September 11$^{th}$ = dummy variable indicating the presence of the month September 2001; $\epsilon =$ error term $\sigma^2$; $\beta_{1-10} =$ regression coefficient; $t =$ time (the month); $t-1 =$ current time (month) lagged by one month. Then I will analyze, using the Granger causality test, the most important relationships among the variables found from OLS and robust regression to assess any causal ordering. Finally, I will construct a graph based off of the robust regression using the R program that shows actual approval and predicted approval with my predictor variables. I expect my independent variables to fit closely with Bush’s actual approval.

RESULTS

Now I analyze my findings from the statistical methods described in the previous chapter. Initially I show how my variables behave in the presence of the control variables. Then I discover the relationship between the variables by using OLS, robust regression, and Granger causality tests. These tests show what variables have the strongest effect on Bush’s approval rate and the characteristics of the whole model. I analyze the strength of these relationships with a focus on their coefficients and standard errors. Then I analyze the results and check on my hypotheses to see if I accept or reject them. I also compare my results to results from similar studies that predict presidential approval to see what differences there are between theirs and mine. This serves to reinforce and dispute some of the previous research on presidential approval. My primary concern is on how my dynamic independent variables (Bush’s media coverage and macroeconomic indicators) react during the honeymoon period, rally periods, second term period and divided government period. This chapter will answer many of my questions about the Bush presidency and presidential approval.

Macroeconomic Indicators During the Occurrence of Control Variables

I analyze how the macroeconomic variables changed during the occurrence of the rally periods, honeymoon period, divided government period, and second term period. This gives everyone a clear picture of the economy during these periods that may have a major impact on the economy’s relationship with approval. However, there is little to no chance of a significant relationship between the macroeconomic indicators and the occurrence of these time periods other than the divided government period. The honeymoon period, rally effect periods, second term period, and divided government period are assessed to see if there are any differences in the average change of the macroeconomic variables before, during, and after the duration of these periods. This will show how different the macroeconomic variables act during the occurrence of the dummy variables\' periods.

During the 9/11 and Iraq War rally periods, percent change in real disposable income ($\%\Delta RDI$) is significantly lower than when these periods are not occurring. $\%\Delta RDI$ experienced 53 percent less growth during these rally periods than during no rally periods. The percent change in unemployment ($\%\Delta U$) during rally periods increased at a 75 percent higher rate than during non-rally period months. The percent change in consumer price index ($\%\Delta CPI$) during the rally periods decreased by a 79 percent higher rate than during other months. When the rally periods are separated, it becomes apparent that these findings are significantly skewed by the first rally period also known as the 9/11 rally period. $\%\Delta RDI$ experienced 239 percent less growth during the 9/11 rally period than during other months. The second rally period had 23 percent higher growth in $\%\Delta RDI$ when compared to the other months. $\%\Delta U$ during the first rally period increased at an 80 percent higher rate than during other months. $\%\Delta U$ during the second rally period increased at a 36 percent higher rate when compared to other months. The $\%\Delta CPI$ during the first rally period decreased at a 580 percent higher rate than during other months. The $\%\Delta CPI$ during the second rally period increased at a 49 percent higher rate when compared to the rest of the Bush presidency. From the analysis of these macroeconomic variables during the two rally periods, the economy did worse during the 9/11 rally period than during the Iraq War rally period.
During the Iraq War rally period the macroeconomic indicators improved, with the exception of the increasing unemployment rate during that rally. Even though the economy did poorly during the 9/11 rally and was mediocre during the Iraq War rally, the president experienced large and sustained increases in his approval rate for those months when the rally occurred. This should influence the overall study of the macroeconomic indicators and Bush’s approval rate and possibly decouple the linkage between these two variables found in the previous research. For that reason, using the rally periods as dummy variables is necessary to control for its effects on the approval rate.

I find a smaller difference between the macroeconomic indicators during the honeymoon period and the rest of Bush’s term. There is no difference in $\%\Delta RDI$ between the honeymoon period and the rest of Bush’s term. There was a 74 percent increase in the growth of $\%\Delta U$ during the honeymoon period, when compared to the non-honeymoon period. During the honeymoon period $\%\Delta CPI$ increased at a 50 percent greater rate when compared to the rest of the Bush Presidency. During the first several months of the Bush Presidency, the economy was very weak and experienced a minor recession. As a result, these findings about the honeymoon period and first rally period are not surprising. During Bush’s second term, I expect to find some economic weakness because of the precipitous economic collapse from 2007-2009. This was even more pronounced during the period of divided government from 2007-2009. During the second term period, there was a 56 percent greater rate of decrease in $\%\Delta RDI$ when compared to the non-second term period. There was an 8 percent greater rate of growth in $\%\Delta U$ during the second term period versus the non-second term period. There was a 12 percent greater rate of growth in $\%\Delta CPI$ during the second term period when compared to the non-second term period. As I expected, the economy was significantly affected by the recession in the final year of his term. Nevertheless, $\%\Delta CPI$ still grew at a healthy clip during this time and this was likely due to the natural resources and real estate boom that significantly pushed up prices for a broad range of goods for much of Bush’s first two years of his second term. I expect the period of divided government to have a significantly worse macroeconomic performance than the rest of Bush’s presidency. During the divided government period there was a 70 percent greater rate of decrease in $\%\Delta RDI$ when compared to the non-divided government period. There was a 92 percent greater rate of growth in the $\%\Delta U$ during the divided government period when compared to the non-divided government period. There was a 13 percent greater rate of decrease in $\%\Delta CPI$ during the divided government period versus the non-divided government period. During the period of divided government, as expected, all of the macroeconomic variables did poorly. The macroeconomic indicators accelerated their decrease in the second half of 2008.

The honeymoon period probably helped increase Bush’s approval rate and supporting my observation was the mediocre economy with increasing unemployment during the honeymoon period. The rally periods, without a doubt, significantly influenced approval because of the steep increase and duration of approval amid a weak economy. This was especially true for the 9/11 rally period. The divided government period likely did not influence approval much because the economic tail-spin likely muffled the effects of divided government on the decreasing approval rate. The second term probably had a greater effect than divided government on declining approval. First, the second term had a mix of good economic growth and shrinking economic activity in the second term’s final year. The second term lacked any rally periods and a main feature of it was the Iraq War that became more unpopular the longer it went. These control variables dilute the macroeconomic variable’s effect on approval because approval is affected by rally periods, the honeymoon period, and the second term period (due to the Iraq War). During the two year divided government period, the macroeconomic variables changed much and helped decrease and keep the approval rate low. This is due to the large decrease in the macroeconomic indicators of CPI and RDI and the large increase in unemployment. This likely foreshadows that the macroeconomic indicators had little effect on Bush’s approval rate for his entire term.

Bush’s Media Coverage During the Occurrence of Control Variables

Here I show how and why the rally periods, honeymoon period, divided government period, and second term period may have affected Bush’s media coverage. The aim of my content analysis was to find how the news media covered President Bush and his administration. During the honeymoon period, the media were not as focused on Bush and did not have as much negative coverage as usual. During Bush’s honeymoon, the media averaged 0.049 positive stories a day, meaning the positive news outnumbered negative news from January to the end of June in 2001 by six stories. During a rally period, the media usually had a strong focus on the presidency and large number of positive stories. In the first rally period, there was a large preponderance of positive news coverage for Bush and his administration with positive news stories averaging out to 0.46 stories per day from 9/11/2001 to 3/31/2002. This means positive stories outnumbered negative stories by an astounding 62 stories during the 9/11 rally period. The second rally period during the Iraq War was more subdued with an average of 0.25 positive stories per day from 3/20/2003-5/31/2003 and positive stories outnumbering negative stories by 23 stories.

During the second term, there was a significant difference in positive and negative coverage with a daily average of 0.47 negative stories. This was likely due to the fact that there was no honeymoon period, no rally periods, an unpopular Iraq War, growing elite criticism, and an economic collapse during the second term; thus, having a significantly higher number of negative stories than positive stories. Divided government began at the midpoint of the second term and lasted until the end of Bush’s term. During the divided government period, Bush’s approval was influenced by all of the same factors that occurred during the second term. Media coverage changed little between the second term and divided government with a daily average of 0.51 negative stories. A characteristic of news coverage during the divided government period is the growing criticism and friction between the president and Congress and the economic collapse which increased the number of negative stories for Bush. These findings indicate that Bush’s media coverage variable likely has a strong relationship with Bush’s approval rate because they behave similarly. These periods affecting approval are controlled in my OLS regression and robust regression models to get an accurate measure of my variables’ relationships with Bush’s approval rate.

OLS Test Results

I calculated my OLS test using a general linear model. A general linear model is a common OLS regression analysis tool I use from the STATA 11 program. Any variable having a p-value at .05 or under is significant. My significant coefficients are in bold
My results indicate that macroeconomic variables are relatively insignificant. The percent change in real disposable income (%∆RDI) was the only macroeconomic variable associated with change in Bush’s approval at the .01 level of significance. A one percent increase in %∆RDI is associated with a 90.1 percent decrease in the approval rate when all other variables are held constant. However, this is deceiving due to %∆RDI’s high standard error and its far less than one percent monthly average percent change.\(^{35}\) The percent change in unemployment (%∆U) and percent change in consumer price index (%∆CPI) have an insignificant relationship with Bush’s approval rate. A one percent increase in %∆U is associated with a 9.2 percent increase in Bush’s approval rate when controlling for the other variables. A one percent increase in $\%\Delta CPI$ is associated with a .5 percent increase in Bush’s approval rate when keeping all other variables constant. All of the standard errors for the economic variables are much higher than the other variables on average.

Bush’s media coverage variable significantly affects Bush’s approval rate at the .001 level of significance. A monthly average of one positive story for Bush’s media coverage rating is associated with a 4.4 percent increase in Bush’s approval rate when all other variables remain constant. This means that news media coverage of Bush is a better predictor of Bush’s approval rate than each of the three macroeconomic indicators because it is more significant and has a lower standard error. The control variables were also important. The rally effect is the most important control variable. A one month occurrence of a rally effect period is associated with 6.3 percent higher approval rate when all variables remain constant. The next most significant control variable is the second term period. The occurrence of a month of this period is associated with a 3.4 percent decrease in Bush’s approval rate when keeping all other variables constant. The next most significant dummy variable is the divided government period. A one month occurrence of divided government is associated with a 3.1 percent decrease in Bush’s approval rate when all other variables are constant. The only control variable that does not have a significant relationship with Bush’s approval rate is the honeymoon period. A one month occurrence of the honeymoon period is associated with a .01 percent decrease in Bush’s approval when all other variables are constant. Lagged approval explains, on average, 70 percent of the change in Bush’s approval rate. This means that only 30 percent of Bush’s approval rate changes from the month before. I also used quarterly data to see if the economic indicators’ relationships with approval were any different, but they were not. Overall, my model works as a rough measure of Bush’s approval rate, but is not as accurate as the robust model.

My robust multivariate regression analysis is a more accurate approach to regression analysis because robust regression accounts for outliers in the data and controls for them by assigning them different weights. September 2001 is incorporated in this analysis as a control variable because that month appears to be an outlier in the analysis of residuals. However, if September 2001 was left alone, the robust model would give it a lower weight than other months. The robust model uses M-estimators and computes nine Huber’s iterations. M-estimators, known as maximum likelihood-type residuals. This model shows similar results with the media variable outperforming the economic variables. Above in Table 2, the significant relationships are in bold.

Not surprisingly, the September 11th dummy variable affects Bush’s approval rate the most out of the variables, increasing approval 24.3 percent during the month of September 2001 when all other variables stay constant. Bush’s one month lagged approval accounts for 80 percent of Bush’s current approval on average. This is 10 percent more than the OLS model; thus, only 20 percent of Bush’s approval rate changes on average from month to month. Since \( R^2 \) equals .98, the predictor variables that change approval account for 18 percent of current approval and 90 percent of the movement in approval. The large \( R^2 \) is problematic because it suggests there are spurious relationships associated with some of the variables, especially the control variables. In the conclusion, I will explain how spurious relationships possibly interfered with the second term period and divided government period and inflated their relationships with Bush’s approval rate. The residual standard error is 2.1 meaning my independent variables are 2.1 standard errors away from actual approval. This means my significant independent variables are close to actual approval.

The difference between Bush’s media coverage and economy’s impact on approval are significant. As far as \( \%\Delta RDI \) is concerned, the robust model relative to the OLS model shows a similar but more accurate coefficient. When \( \%\Delta RDI \) increases by one percent over a month there is a decrease in Bush’s approval rate by 51 percent. \( \%\Delta RDI \) has a monthly average increase of .009 percent meaning it really is associated with a .46 percent monthly decrease in Bush’s approval. The only difference between Bush’s media coverage and the \( \%\Delta RDI \) is that the \( \%\Delta RDI \) is not as significant and has a higher standard error than the Bush’s media coverage variable. %ΔCPI and %ΔU are insignificant predictors of approval. The media coverage of Bush variable, on the other hand, has a significant effect on approval and a low standard error. Bush’s approval increases by 2.2 percent when Bush’s media coverage rating averages one positive story over a full month and vice-versa. The honeymoon period has no significant effect on approval in both OLS and robust regressions. The other dummy variables have a significant effect on approval with the rally periods having the strongest relationship. On average, one month of a rally period is associated with a 4.6 percent increase in Bush’s approval when the other variables are constant.

My OLS regression model is not as accurate as the robust model. Even if the OLS model included the September 11th control variable, it probably would not make a big difference. This is due to OLS not being as accurate as robust regression at regression analysis. Robust regression is more thorough in how it regresses the variables because robust regression weighs the variables differently due to their properties. The robust regression model provides different measures of model accuracy such as $R^2$ whereas the OLS general linear model provides the AIC (Akaike Information Criterion).^37

My next step after analyzing the significant statistical relationships between my variables, their properties, and the models’ properties is to see the causal direction of the relationships. In other words, I want to see at what period of time each variable

^37 I do not mention the AIC for a couple of reasons. First, it is a diagnostic not commonly used in political science statistics. Second, and more importantly, it is more difficult to interpret because $R^2$ ranges from zero to one while the AIC ranges from 0 to an infinite number. Since there is no range for the AIC, it is hard to find out what is a good AIC unless you construct multiple models to get multiple AICs and establish a range.
changes, so I know which one happens before the other and is more likely to affect the other. You can infer that one causes the other as long as one occurs right before the other, the statistical relationship is strong between the two, and there is strong theoretical support from prior research that eliminates alternative explanations for approval change. There is no reason to suspect a lurking variable because they are accounted for by my variables. Nevertheless, Granger causality does not always work due to the presence of serial correlation and variables moving simultaneously. A Granger test is a very exhaustive statistical test that shows causal ordering by determining how time lags of one variable affect the other variable’s lags. I use a bivariate Granger test to analyze the relationship between the independent variables and Bush’s approval rate.

The first Granger test indicates that Bush’s approval rate was “Granger-caused” by his media coverage. Also Bush’s media coverage variable was not “Granger-caused” by the Bush’s approval rate. In other words, variable $x$ (Bush’s media coverage) “Granger-causes” variable $y$ (Bush’s approval rate) if $x$’s lagged values predict $y$, but $y$’s lagged values do not predict $x$ when lagged values of both $x$ and $y$ are included in the predictive models. $\%\Delta RDI$ does not “Granger-cause” Bush’s approval rate, but Bush’s approval rate “Granger-causes” $\%\Delta RDI$. This means that $\%\Delta RDI$ occurs after the approval rate moves. In other words, when Bush’s approval rate decreases $\%\Delta RDI$ will increase and when approval increases $\%\Delta RDI$ will decrease.

38 Bush’s media coverage variable handles a number of these lurking event variables because I cover all of the events in the media during Bush’s presidency. Therefore, an event will not result in an alternative explanation for the causal relationship between Bush’s approval and the independent variables.

39 This test is found online and uses R code to conduct these tests. It was built by Patrick Wessa (2008).

40 This is a standard jargon when speaking about the results of a Granger test.

41 The Granger tests are located in Appendix M.
This does not appear to make any sense on theoretical grounds; however, I believe if quarterly economic data was used, $\%\Delta RDI$ would cause approval change. I believe this because prior research indicates that it takes well over a month for the economy to affect presidential approval. Nevertheless, I got the same result. There is a high likelihood that there is some serial correlation between lagged $\%\Delta RDI$ and lagged Bush’s approval that is causing its Granger test results to appear meaningless.

I find nothing significant when Granger testing the control variables and insignificant variables. The rally period, second term period, divided government period, and honeymoon period did not “Granger-cause” Bush's approval rate and vice-versa. The $\%\Delta CPI$ “Granger-causes” Bush's approval and vice-versa. The $\%\Delta U$ does not “Granger-cause” Bush’s approval rate, but Bush’s approval rate “Granger-causes” unemployment. The $\%\Delta RDI$, $\%\Delta CPI$, and $\%\Delta U$ have Granger test results that make little sense because there is no evidence to support those findings. This is little cause for worry because none of these variables except for $\%\Delta RDI$ significantly affect the change in Bush’s approval rate. The $\%\Delta CPI$’s and $\%\Delta U$’s weak relationships with Bush’s approval rate are one reason why they have meaningless Granger test results.

Bush’s media coverage, $\%\Delta RDI$, rally effect, second term, and divided government significantly affect Bush’s approval rate change. Out of these five variables, only Bush's media coverage had a one-way “Granger-causation” where Bush’s media coverage occurred first and influenced people to change their approval of Bush. The Granger test results for $\%\Delta RDI$ made little sense and that is likely due to serial correlation. The Granger test results are somewhat consistent with the OLS and robust

42 This result is located in Appendix O.
43 Interestingly, the correlation table in Appendix H shows there is little correlation between RDI change and Bush’s approval rate.
regression results by showing some causation between a significant dynamic variable (Bush’s media coverage) and Bush’s approval. The Granger test and robust regression make the results more accurate and add greater explanatory power.

Success of Predictions

Now I analyze the success of my hypotheses to see if I was able to predict the outcomes of the relationships between Bush’s approval rate and independent variables. In the first hypothesis, I predicted that there is a significant relationship between Bush’s media coverage variable and Bush’s approval rate where the more positive Bush’s media coverage rating is the more Bush’s approval rate increases. This hypothesis passes muster with my robust model at the .01 level of significance when controlling for other variables.

As for my third hypothesis, I predict my Granger causality test will show that Bush’s media coverage changes before Bush’s approval rate changes. My Granger test results confirm my null hypothesis that there is causal ordering of Bush’s media coverage changing first and then Bush’s approval rate changing.

For my second hypothesis, I hypothesized that there is an insignificant relationship between all three of my macroeconomic variables (%ΔCPI, %ΔRDI, and %ΔU) and Bush’s approval rate. This hypothesis is somewhat validated by the results of the OLS and robust regression; however, %ΔRDI had a significant relationship with Bush’s approval rate at the .01 level of significance. Other than the significance of %ΔRDI, my prediction was actually quite close to what happened. This finding goes against much previous research that shows a poor economy decreases presidential approval and vice-versa. According to my results, the economy was insignificant compared to the effects that the rally period, second term period, divided government period, and even Bush's media coverage had on Bush's approval rate. During Bush's second term period and divided government period, the economy began declining in 2007. By 2009 it was apparent that the economy played a significant role in decreasing Bush's approval since 2007, but by this time it was too late in Bush's presidency for the economy to be a significant predictor of his approval rate.

My fourth hypothesis concerns whether Bush’s media coverage matters more to his approval than the performance of the U.S. economy. The relationship between Bush’s approval rate and Bush’s media coverage is stronger than the relationship between Bush’s approval and \(\%\Delta\text{RDI}\) because the P-value for Bush’s media coverage variable is smaller than the \(\%\Delta\text{RDI}\) variable by .01. My fifth hypothesis is that the honeymoon period is associated with increasing approval. Surprisingly, the results from both regressions show that the honeymoon period is not a significant predictor of Bush's approval rate.\(^4\) I reject the null hypothesis because the honeymoon period did not affect approval as much as the other variables. The rally effect variable and Bush’s media coverage variable had more pronounced effects on Bush's approval when compared to the honeymoon period, and the poor economy during the honeymoon period depressed Bush's approval.

My sixth hypothesis is that strong relationships exist between both the second term and divided government periods and Bush's approval rate. The regression results show that there are strong relationships between these control variables and Bush's approval.

\(^4\) Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo (2006) found this out as well in their research of Bush’s approval. I discuss this further in the Conclusion.
approval rate.\textsuperscript{45} When these periods occur, they are associated with lower approval for Bush when controlling for my other variables. I believe Bush's approval rate may have decreased during these time periods due to other more significant reasons like the growing unpopularity of the Iraq War, the growing preponderance of negative news coverage of Bush, greater elite criticism of Bush, and the economic collapse from 2007-2009.

Final Model Graph and Implications

I graph predicted approval from my independent variables to show how similar my model is to actual approval. On the next page, Graph \textsuperscript{46} is the representation of predicted and actual approval. From the closeness of fit between the two lines, it is apparent that my model of predicted approval does a decent job in predicting Bush’s approval rate. This also highlights how unique Bush’s presidency is because of the dummy variables. The only dummy variable that every president automatically gets is the honeymoon period. Bush’s presidency was distinctive by having two distinct rally periods and being a two term president. Another unique factor captured by the media’s portrayal of Bush is the Iraq War. This served to push down his popularity even though the economy was growing through the middle years of his presidency.

The war along with the rally periods explain why the macroeconomic indicators were weakly related to Bush’s approval rate. A growing economy is correlated with decreasing approval. This is because the economy did not grow much when approval was still high during the rally periods and honeymoon period (approval was on its way down but still higher than average), and did not start increasing until after the Iraq War.

rally when approval was well over 50 percent. This finding goes against prevailing research on the economy and presidential approval.

Graph 11: Model of Predicted and Actual Approval with Control Periods

The results show a strong model with many variables that can significantly predict approval. They only predict one president's approval but are tailored to determine other president's approval rates. The macroeconomic variable's inability to predict approval surprised me as previous research from Hibbs et. al. (1982), Monroe (1978), Lanoue (1987), Norpoth (1984), and Brody (1991) show that macroeconomic variables are usually significant in determining a president's approval. On the other hand, the behavior of Bush's media coverage was not surprising because of the high degree of correlation between the movement in Bush's approval rate and the movement in Bush's media coverage rating. This finding on Bush's media coverage supports previous research on the media's effects on people's thoughts and opinions from Brody...
(1991), Fan (1988), Iyengar and Kinder (1987), among many others. This shows that people are aware of major events covered by the media and rationally change their behavior through priming due to the media’s proclivity toward agenda-setting.

The control variables perform well by isolating the effects the macroeconomic and media coverage of Bush variables have on Bush’s approval rate. The control variables behave predictably and support the existing literature. The only surprise that went against the existing approval research was the insignificance of the honeymoon period to Bush’s approval rate. The honeymoon period’s strong influence on the approval rate happens for a significant majority of presidents (Brody 1991). The lagged approval rate was similar to previous presidencies because 70 to 80 percent of people during these presidencies did not change their approval of the president on a month to month basis.

The final part of this study is to put my results in the context of the broader research on the study of public opinion and presidential approval. I plan on discussing how other aspects of Bush’s presidency are focused on when analyzing his approval rate. Another important part to this study is to examine the usefulness of using media content to predict opinion change and how it works in my study. I also point out this study’s contributions to existing research and the possible future improvements to it. There are a number of other research projects that can be built from this research study. I will go through additional methods that can improve this project to see how I can improve on this current one and improve the field of approval research.
CONCLUSION

My study aimed to find the primary influences on presidential approval from previous research and apply those variables to George W. Bush’s approval rate. I wanted to find out if the variables would behave similarly to their behavior from other approval research on other administrations. I plan to expand upon this further in the conclusion.

The findings from my study show that news media significantly influence peoples’ evaluations of the presidency. When coverage of President Bush and his administration is mostly negative, people change their opinions of Bush and his approval rate decreases. My study shows that people observe and are influenced by the news media and their coverage of the presidency. From this result I infer that people behave rationally when being influenced by the news. It is rational for people, when believing what they see in the news, to change their opinions in a manner that is consistent with the news media coverage. When someone sees a president succeeding or failing in the news, it is rational to change his or her opinion of him to respectively approve or disapprove of his job as president.

In the literature review, I found that news media are not biased in their political coverage. This does not mean that their coverage of events cannot change Bush’s approval rate. The event itself and how much attention given to it is what matters most when influencing people. Without the media, most people would not know about current events and would be unable to evaluate the president’s performance properly due to a lack of information.
Bush did not enjoy a significant honeymoon period. Bush’s honeymoon period provided little lift to his approval rate and was overshadowed by other variables having greater predictive power on the approval rate. The rally effect periods, second term period, divided government period, Bush coverage in the media, and percent change in real disposable income ($\Delta$RDI) were all more influential in determining Bush’s approval rate than the honeymoon period. The honeymoon period does not have much of an effect on approval because Bush's approval during that time was not significantly greater than the mean of his approval rate for his whole presidency. Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo’s (ESL’s) (2006) found the same thing, and they described it as an “anti-honeymoon” effect; yet Fox’s (2009) findings disagree with our studies because he found the honeymoon period to be significantly related to Bush’s approval rate. Fox (2009) used decay effects for the honeymoon period and that made a difference between it being significant and insignificant. From research on Bush’s approval, he either has or does not have a honeymoon period depending on how it is operationalized.

The events and control variables that most significantly moved Bush’s approval rate were the two rally effect periods – the 9/11 attacks and the start of the Iraq War. What happened during Bush's rally events was little different from the research on these rallies. These rally events were not completely independent of the media effects from Bush’s media coverage variable. As I pointed out in the previous chapter, there is a large preponderance of positive over negative news stories about Bush during those rally periods. However, these events are independent of the media to a significant degree because Bush’s approval increased far more than what news media coverage justified. Rally events tend to have strong effects on approval, to the point where the change in approval takes on a life of its own. Fox's (2009) and ESL's (2006) research found rally periods to be significant as well.

Two prolonged events I control for, the second term period and divided government period have independent and significant effects on Bush's approval rate. There is little support for divided government effects on approval in previous research, and the second term is correlated with decreasing approval for a large majority of two term presidencies. However, I have a problem arguing that the second term lowered Bush's approval rate independent of all other variables. Even though approval research shows that second terms are associated with lower approval rates, Bush's approval rate decreased before the onset of the second term. Even during the second term when his approval rate continued its drop, the factors that likely made a larger impact on the decrease in the approval rate were media coverage (especially of the prolonged and unpopular Iraq War, 2007-2008 presidential campaign and election), the economic collapse of 2007-2009, and the lack of a honeymoon period and rally period in the second term that accentuate the difference between his first and second terms. Thus far, only Fox (2009) has studied these differences between the first and second terms, but did not control for them. He reached some of the same conclusions such as the economic collapse, unpopularity of the Iraq War, and timing of rally periods as being significant factors in the difference between the two terms (Fox 2009).

In the second term, the president relies on his partisan base and cobbles together groups willing to support certain policies. The president’s opposition becomes a “coalition of minorities” opposed to his agenda. They are led by the opposing partisan base that joins a combination of minorities opposed to certain policies of the president. According to approval research, these coalitions dominate the president's second term and help lead a steady decline in the president's approval rate (Mueller 1973). Unfortunately I did not measure the effect the “coalition of minorities” and can only speculate on its effects at this point. The lack of a honeymoon period is another factor, albeit weak, that impacts presidential approval in the second term because the president’s agenda, character, and personality are well known by the start of the second term. Even with regard to those factors, I believe the second term’s impact on approval is somewhat inflated. The divided government period variable’s effect on Bush's approval is inflated because it occurred in the latter half of the second term when the divided government period had some of the same events that affected the second term’s influence on approval. Even though the second term and divided government periods have a significant relationship with Bush’s approval, the other factors I mentioned artificially inflate these periods' effects on Bush's approval rate. Using these periods as dummy variables helped my study by making the results for the dynamic variables more valid and accurate.

The Iraq War, captured in the media coverage of Bush variable, played a significant role in affecting Bush’s approval. This event began with a rally event, but became unpopular as explained in the third chapter. Initially it was a unifying issue for the president; however, it ended up becoming a wedge issue that energized the “coalitions of minorities”. This war, being the biggest news story during Bush's presidency (Tyndall 2010), significantly contributed to the decrease in Bush's approval rate. News media coverage of the war along with their coverage of other wedge issues energized and strengthened the “coalition of minorities” and independents that based their judgments on the success and failure of Bush’s war policy among his other policies. Other events, such as the Hurricane Katrina disaster, the increasing criticism of Bush’s foreign and national security policies, the 2007-09 economic collapse, the 2006 Congressional elections, and the 2007-08 Presidential campaign had a similar effect to the Iraq War on Bush’s approval rate but were not covered as much.

The media are responsible for people knowing about these events. Without the media, we would not hear the proverbial tree falling down in the middle of forest. Today, with the media’s ability to cover all major events, people almost always find out about major events and their ongoing developments through the media. To measure an event’s impact on the American public without acknowledging the media’s role as broadcaster of events would falsely portray the reality of the situation. For instance, I could have used U.S. troop casualty rates from the Iraq War to assess the Iraq War’s impact on presidential approval. Instead I used a content analysis of the news media to measure the war among other event’s impact on Bush’s approval. Mine is a more accurate method because it analyzes those events with all other events using similar measures; thus, having a comprehensive analysis of all known events under the same rules of analysis. The content analysis of media does this by measuring all events and their effects under the same measures. I basically treat an event as a part of the media broadcast because it happened prior to it being broadcasted. Once the event is manifested in the broadcast, it can influence the audience. But before that manifestation the event has no effect on the aggregate population.

The most surprising result, other than the absence of a relationship between the honeymoon period and approval, was the lack of a clear relationship between the macroeconomic indicators and approval. Two macroeconomic indicators that I used as variables, percent change in unemployment rate ($\Delta U$) and percent change in consumer price index ($\Delta CPI$), showed no significant relationship with presidential approval. This surprised me because most other presidents’ approval rates are significantly related to these macroeconomic indicators in a predictable manner. However, Bush’s presidency was different than other presidencies because other events such as the 9/11 rally, Iraq War rally, Iraq War (Voeten and Brewer 2006; Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo 2006; Gelpi, Feaver, and Reifler 2006; Hetherington and Nelson 2004), Hurricane Katrina, among other events largely overshadowed the economy. These events largely deflated the economy's impact on presidential approval until Bush’s final year in office and, according to Eichenberg, Stoll, Lebo (2006), likely his first eight months in office. This is similar to how the events inflated the effect of the second term and divided government period on Bush’s approval rate. Other than these differences, most everything was in line with other presidencies.

As far as Bush’s overall presidency, the economy was overshadowed by much more important, news-worthy events. I believe my media coverage of Bush variable played a crucial role in overshadowing the economic effects on Bush’s approval rate. Fox’s (2009) study shows how the economy was a significant predictor of Bush’s approval; however, he never included a media coverage of Bush variable. Not including the media coverage of Bush variable likely made his economic effects on Bush’s approval larger than they should be. In defense of Fox’s (2009) study, he is primarily concerned with presidential approval among different partisan orientations, which makes it more difficult to measure how media coverage affects differing partisan orientations short of a laboratory study.

Only the percent change in real disposable income (\(\%\Delta RDI\)) had a significant relationship.\(^{47}\) As \(\%\Delta RDI\) increased at greater rates, Bush’s approval rate decreased at greater rates; which is an inverse relationship. Prior research and common sense dictate that as \(\%\Delta RDI\) grows by a higher than normal rate, the president’s approval rate should increase; thus, a proportional relationship. The theory is that as people economically prosper, they are more likely to approve of the president’s handling of his job. In other words, as the American economy grows and prospers the president’s approval rate increases. This never happened in the case of \(\%\Delta RDI\).

My Granger causality test of the relationship between \(\%\Delta RDI\) and Bush’s approval rate showed that changing approval affects the \(\%\Delta RDI\). In other words, when approval increases, the \(\%\Delta RDI\) will decrease; and when approval decreases, \(\%\Delta RDI\) increases. I could not find any reasonable theoretical justification for presidential approval affecting the \(\%\Delta RDI\). Even as I pointed out in the last chapter, I tried quarterly data for the \(\%\Delta RDI\) and got the same results as the monthly data. Likely serial correlation exists between the lags of the variables; thus, muddling the outcome of the test. Unfortunately, there is nothing I can do to find a causal direction between \(\%\Delta RDI\) and Bush’s approval.

My media coverage of Bush variable is successful in exposing the media content of Bush and providing a clear measure of how each story impacts people’s opinions of the president. This content analysis of media coverage of Bush goes beyond previous research by using a more voluminous, detailed, and nuanced measure of media coverage of Bush. As a result, it goes beyond most computer textual analysis programs by determining the impact of the entire story rather than stringing key words together to determine the meaning of the news story. It also covers several news articles on average for every day of Bush’s presidency rather than one or two top stories per day. I believe this makes my measure more accurate and it is reflected in the results that show it as a strong predictor of approval.

\(^{47}\) Interestingly Fox (2009) found real disposable personal income growth per capita (basically the same thing as \(\%\Delta RDI\)) to have less of a relationship with Bush’s approval than unemployment and inflation (the same thing as \(\%\Delta CPI\) and \(\%\Delta U\)) and that is exactly the opposite of what I found.

When compared to similar studies that measure media impact on public opinion, this is one of the few that focuses on the president, and the only one that uses as much news in the content analysis as possible. This increases the accuracy of my content analysis because it is more holistic by focusing on all top news. It makes sense to approach it that way for a couple reasons. First, there are usually multiple top stories in a day and, at times, multiple top stories involving the presidency. Second, most people may know a top story or two, but are unlikely to know which story is the most important or know all of the top stories. So when a researcher does a content analysis of news and uses one or two stories on average, it likely does not accurately measure the overall influence the media have on people. Similar media research, like Brody’s (1991), looks at only one top story a day; thus, decreasing the accuracy of this variable capturing news content about the president. However, it appears to work for Brody (1991) because his time period is much longer giving him a large sample size of media content. If he did that for an eight year period, the results would have less accuracy and meaning.

48 I could have found more news stories about the president if I knew back when I performed it what I know now about news media transcript archival research. In my future research and future content analyses, I will be more thorough due to my new found knowledge on this mode of research.
There is room for improvements on this study. These improvements include:

1. Studying approval from other presidencies to increase external validity.

2. Using more advanced statistical models such as logistic regression, vector auto regression (VAR), and vector error correlation (VEC) models.

3. Using the Index of Consumer Sentiment or a scale of economic growth that incorporates the RDI, the unemployment rate, and the CPI. These two measures of our economy might better predict presidential approval than using separate measures of CPI, unemployment, and RDI.

4. Studying short-term opinion change and comparing it to long-term opinion change by using a smaller unit of analysis such as a day.

5. Classifying news articles with greater detail to examine what types of stories have a greater effect on presidential approval.

6. Using a logistic regression to pin-point the threshold at which presidential approval is affected by the economy and media coverage of the president.

7. Using decay effects for the rally period and honeymoon period to get a more accurate measure of these variables’ impacts.

The first improvement would considerably increase the external validity of my research. I explicitly acknowledge that the results from my study can only be applied to the Bush Presidency; thus, limiting this work’s results to a single presidency. Also, Bush’s presidency was unique from the standpoint of what did and did not affect his approval rate. Nevertheless, other research shows that presidential approval behaves similarly for most presidencies when controlling for different administrations, meaning this research does have some degree of external validity (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002; Brody 1991). I will pursue this improvement in my future research on presidential approval.

The second improvement is rather minor but still worth incorporating. These more advanced statistical models (VAR and VEC models) yield results with greater accuracy and explanatory power. Many leading presidential approval scholars currently utilize these models; therefore, they have a high degree of legitimacy in the field. These models can strengthen the accuracy and legitimacy of my results. However, my lack of knowledge and experience with these models prevented me from using them. The OLS and robust models give me similar results as the VAR and VEC models because they are nearly as accurate. Also my data follows the assumptions of OLS and my sample is large. I plan on learning these statistical techniques, so I can implement them in my future research.

The third improvement can add legitimacy to my research. Much other presidential approval research incorporates scales for macroeconomic indicators – usually their own constructed scale or the Index of Consumer Sentiment. It probably would not change my findings; however, it is a potential weakness, if my study’s model is to be applied toward other presidencies. Also in Fox’s (2009) study of Bush’s approval, through using different methods and measures, he found his macroeconomic indicators to significantly affect aggregate presidential approval. I cannot discount Fox’s findings because some of his methods could make my study more accurate, even though he did not account for media effects. My future study of approval will include the Index of Consumer Sentiment and possibly a scale of economic growth that incorporates the RDI, unemployment rate, and CPI.

The next improvement is to track short-term movement of approval to see how media content influences approval in the short-term which is any period under a month. Comparing the short-term and long-term trends to presidential approval change can strengthen my results. The logic behind this improvement is to find out if short-term change in approval and its predictors presage the long-term change in the approval rate and its predictors. In other words, I want to see if short-term change in these variables mimics their long-term change, and by how much before decay occurs. Decay occurs when the short-term change in the variable begins to no longer affect its long-term change. This can show what differences exist between the short and long-term effects in the media, among other variables, have on presidential approval. Lacking this refinement does not necessarily affect my results, but having a daily measure along with a monthly measure strengthens the internal validity between my predictor variables and presidential approval.

The fifth improvement is one that can open the door to much more research on media effects on public opinion. Media coverage of the president is essentially an intervening variable in the relationship between events and presidential approval change. My future research on presidential approval rate change will account for this by knowing what type of stories and events had a major or minor effect on Bush’s approval rate. For instance, there are plenty of studies, including this one, that focus on the honeymoon period, rally effect, and economy's effect on the president's approval rate without accounting for news media coverage impact on these events. My study can be more descriptive by capturing the dynamic relationships between the types of events and presidential approval through news coverage of those events and their relationship to the president. I started to do this by going through the tedious process of analyzing news media content of the president and its relationship to presidential approval, but did not go far enough by classifying stories into economic, rally, war, policy, among other domains. The only problem with classifying news coverage is the fact that coverage sometimes fits under more than one category. This refinement to my content analysis will significantly improve my research and add another layer to it that will help explain how media coverage of different issue and event areas effect people’s approval of the president.

The sixth improvement refines the analysis of Bush’s approval rate. I could have improved my study by using a logistic regression to pin-point the threshold at which variables significantly impact his approval rate. This could also be done for any significant dynamic variable. I did not incorporate a logistic regression analysis to study these thresholds because of my inexperience with logistic regression. This is something I will learn and incorporate in my future research because it will bring greater explanatory power to my results. This refinement can significantly improve my future research.

The seventh improvement of using decay effects can improve the accuracy of my rally effect and honeymoon period variables. Both the rally period and honeymoon period are measured in a monthly unit of analysis and if decay effects are used than the months that are further from the start of it are weighed less and the ones nearer to the start are weighed more. Decay effects were the likely reason why my honeymoon period was not significant when Fox’s (2009) was. Also this would correct the problem of having days within the starting month of the rally that are not a part of the rally. A month with several days not a part of the rally would weigh less.

My study also has a number of contributions to presidential approval research. They include:

1. Analyzing approval for the entirety of the Bush presidency.
2. Using a model with a unique combination of all proper and necessary variables in a monthly unit of analysis to predict Bush’s approval rate.
3. Capturing the realistic effects that the media have on people’s approval of the Bush presidency.

My research’s contribution to the body of approval research is squarely focused on its highly accurate style of predicting George W. Bush’s approval rate. My addition of the news media to predict approval is a novel approach because I take the media very seriously as an influence on approval and use as much daily data from the news media as I could find when searching transcripts. With greater amounts of news media data on a daily basis, you can more accurately track presidential approval. This was the first study to focus on media coverage to such a degree and also the first to examine it for the full length of the Bush presidency.

Future content analyses measuring media influence on presidential approval will continue to be more accurate and detailed. What I found, hypothetically speaking, is that anything consistently polled and consistently covered by the news media is available to the researcher to perform a content analysis of that coverage to see where public opinion will shift for that poll. This can be done because usually when there is a running public opinion poll on a topic, it is on a topic covered by the news media.
Measuring news media’s effect on public opinion can be a predictor of public opinion. This research helps confirm that if a content analysis is able to predict public opinion for a poll, it is likely that a content analysis can even predict public opinion on things not being polled. A monthly unit of analysis gives enough data with a large enough sample size to accurately model the variables. A monthly unit of analysis emphasizes long-term trends in presidential approval change, and favors that because long-term opinion change is more stable and more likely to be converted into some sort of action. This means a higher likelihood of changing approval because it normally does not change much during a month. This research is the first to show a strong link between media coverage of Bush\textsuperscript{49} and Bush’s approval rate. I also break new ground by using Granger causality analyses between Bush’s approval and my predictor variables. The aim of this is to show what comes first; thus, giving a causal direction with the change in the media “Granger-causing”\textsuperscript{50} change in Bush’s approval.

The results of my research are unique because of the differences in methods and operationalization of variables between my study and other similar studies on Bush’s approval. As I pointed out near the beginning of this concluding chapter, there are certain differences between my study, Eichenberg, Stoll, and Lebo’s (ESL’s) (2006) study, and Fox’s (2009) study that give our studies varying results. I found the honeymoon effect to be an insignificant predictor of Bush’s approval while ESL agreed and Fox disagreed. My results on the rally effect for 9/11 and the Iraq War are both confirmed from ESL’s (2006) and Fox’s (2009) research as very significant to the change in Bush’s approval rate. I found the macroeconomic indicators, other than the monthly percent change in RDI, to be insignificant in their affect on Bush’s approval. ESL (2006) found the economy to have a significant relationship prior to 9/11 but not after, and Fox (2009) found the economy to significantly affect Bush’s approval for his entire presidency. The second term control variable behaves as it does in most other approval research because it is associated with lower and declining presidential approval (Erikson, MacKuen, and Stimson 2002). Only the Eisenhower, Reagan, and Clinton presidencies can boast no significant loss of approval in their second term (2002). My divided government period disagrees with Nicholson, Segura, and Wood’s (2002) research because divided government in my study is associated with lower approval; however, the conditions in 2007-2009 could not be any more different than in 1995-2000. This lowers my expectations that I uncovered anything new or relevant with the second term or divided government periods other than show the uniqueness of the Bush presidency.

In summary, there are three significant contributions of this research. One centers on my media content analysis of the presidency and the media coverage of Bush variable formed from that analysis. Another significant contribution is the comparison between my research on Bush’s approval rate and other’s research on previous presidencies’ approval rates. The final contribution of my study details Bush’s approval change relative to other studies on Bush’s approval with strong similarities and differences in our methods and results. The continued study of presidential approval in light of the growing influence of the media on presidential approval will only help define the economic and control variables’ proper relationship with presidential approval. I believe that these methods and variables will likely work well to better predict past, present, and future president’s approval.

To end, future research on presidential approval will need to incorporate a larger number of tools to improve on previous research and accurately model approval among presidencies. Aforementioned are a number ways this study contributed to approval research and can be improved. First, the analysis of thresholds at which approval changes with the use of a logistic regression adds greater explanatory power. Second, the use of vector autoregressive (VAR) or vector error correction (VEC) models add greater explanatory power and precision to the model. Third, the use of daily and monthly time-series data to analyze short-term and long-term change in the presidential approval can discover the characteristics of the relationship between long-term and short-term trends in approval rate change. Fourth, the expansion of my study’s time-span to thirty or more years can vastly improve its external validity. Fifth, the use of macroeconomic indices can give my study greater legitimacy among approval scholars. Sixth, and likely most important, the use and refinement of analyzing media coverage of the presidency to better predict approval can add greater explanatory power to media effects on presidential approval. This is the most important contribution and improvement because, even though media effects on approval was a primary contribution of my research, it still can be much improved through greater categorization of news media stories to find the relationship between news coverage of topics that concern the presidency and presidential approval. Finally, using decay effects for the rally periods and honeymoon periods will help more accurately predict approval. These improvements and my study’s framework toward it make presidential approval research a far from exhausted field of research that will continue to be explored for many years to come.

ABSTRACT

APPROVAL OF GEORGE W. BUSH: ECONOMIC AND MEDIA IMPACTS

GINO TOZZI JR.

May 2011

Advisor: Prof. Ewa Golebiowska

Major: American Government

Degree: Doctor of Philosophy

George W. Bush’s approval rate had its shares of ups and downs. In this time series analysis, I study the empirical evidence of the media’s and economy's impact on his approval rate from 2001-2009. People tend to hold the president responsible for the country’s economic performance and the media influence people’s opinions of the president through agenda setting and priming. I operationalize the media influence on people into an independent variable. My economic independent variables are the monthly percent change in inflation, unemployment, and real disposable income. The dependent variable is Bush's approval rate. This study seeks to understand the relationship between the economy, media, and George W. Bush’s approval rate and add insight to the body of approval research.
